CYC-CORPUS JURIS PARALLEL REFERENCE TABLE

The following tables show where every proposition in CYC (if still the law) is located in CORPUS JURIS. This table translates CYC citations into CORPUS JURIS citations. No matter where you get a CYC citation, whether in an opinion, a brief, an annotated statute, a textbook, or elsewhere, this table gives the corresponding CORPUS JURIS citation. The CYC Index and Concordance, by means of this table, becomes a Key to CORPUS JURIS, equally as well as to CYC. This table makes Cyc Citations available in Corpus Juris.

I. NATURE AND ORGANIZATION

[§ 1] A. Definitions and Distinctions[1]—1. Religious Society. A religious society is an assembly met, or a body of persons who usually meet, in some stated place for the worship of God and religious instruction.[2] It is made up of individuals who have associated together for religious as opposed to secular purposes,[3] having no regard to the particular mode or manner of constituting or forming the society,[4] or to its being incorporated,[5] although the term as used in particular statutes may have reference to incorporated[6] or quasi-incorporated[7] religious societies. In the New England states, the term religious society has been used as synonymous with parish to refer to an incorporated society created and maintained for the support of public worship.[8]

[§ 2] 2. Church.[9] The term "church," elsewhere defined,[10] is sometimes employed as of the same meaning as "religious society" and sometimes in a more restricted sense as meaning a body having to do only with matters relating to the religious doctrine and discipline of its members apart from any temporal matters such as the acquisition and ownership of property and the maintenance of facilities for worship.[11] So, a church and a religious society may or may not be distinct, separate bodies, depending upon the usages and law of the jurisdiction and the nature of the church polity of the particular church under consideration.[12]

[§ 3] 3. Religious Corporation.[13] A religious corporation is a corporation whose purposes as defined by charter or statute are directly ancillary to divine worship or religious teaching,[14] although the scope and application of the term may be defined and restricted by the terms of the statute in which it is used.[15] A corporation established for purely academic purposes, for education in literature and in the arts and sciences, is in no sense a religious corporation,[16] even though engaged in educating youths for the ministry,[17] or placed under the management of a religious body.[18] Nor is a charitable society made into a religious corporation by being controlled by a church.[19] A statute defining a religious corporation as a corporation created for religious purposes,[20] has been held to apply to a corporation organized to provide churches for seamen,[21] although other corporations so closely allied to religion that they may be broadly classed as religious corporations have been held not to be within the class designated as such by a particular statute.[22]

[§ 4] B. Organization in General.[23] The organization of religious societies in this country may be affected, and generally is, by one of three different systems of church government, episcopacy or prelacy, presbyterianism, or congregationalism; the first of which systems may be described as a church ruled by one or by a special group by virtue of a claimed divine right; the second, as a church in which the powers of government are vested in the body of believers and are exercised through their chosen representatives, the local church being subordinated to the control of a supreme governing body; and the third, as a church where each local body is a self-governing independent democracy.[24] Typical of the independent group are the Congregational societies and churches in New England,[25] while the Presbyterian congregations associated with the early history of New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania are illustrative of the group in which the local congregation is controlled by superior representative bodies,[26] and the Roman Catholic and Episcopal Communions are the groups representing a church government by one or a group ruling under a claim of divine right.[27]

[a] Protestant Episcopal Church.—The "religious society" of a particular Protestant Episcopal Church consists of the communicants of that denomination who statedly attend divine services in the church edifice, while the members of the "religious corporation" are the persons within the congregation of the church who are entitled to vote in corporate elections for church wardens and vestrymen, and under Religious Corporations Law, § 43, it is not necessary that members of the corporation and all its trustees be communicants of the Protestant Episcopal Church, or members of the religious society, and a member of the religious society is not necessarily a member of the corporation. Congregationalism. The parish-and-church type of organization is characteristic of the Congregational religious communities in New England, the religious society or parish controlling in temporal and the church in ecclesiastical affairs.[28] A church of the Congregational faith and polity is almost uniformly connected with a society or parish, but the two bodies are distinct and separate, one from the other;[29] and so, wherever the church polity is congregational or independent, there generally is the dual type of organization,[30] although in some states there is a merger of the two jurisdictions, ecclesiastical and temporal, in a single body, the church society.[31]

Presbyterianism. The theory of two distinct bodies, society and church, independent of each other, founded upon the early New England parish and town organization and applied to the New England Congregational type of church government,[32] has no application to a church whose polity consists of self-government through chosen representatives, the local body being a subordinate member of some general church organization in which there are appellate tribunals with ultimate power of control.[33] The governing body in the Presbyterian congregations is the "church session"; the sessions in a district being represented in the district "presbytery"; chosen representatives from the congregations constituting the "synod" which embraces a number of presbyteries; and over all the General Assembly, a representative body composed of ministers and ruling elders selected by each of the presbyteries.[34]

"Different Christian denominations have different forms of government. There are three forms of government which have gained prevalence in Christian communities, and which are still maintained. It may be that all classes of Christian churches may be brought under one or the other of these three forms of church government. One is the prelatical form in which the governing power resides in prelates or diocesan bishops and the higher clergy. To this form of government may be assigned the Roman, Greek, English, and most Oriental churches. Another is the Presbyterian form in which the governing power resides in assemblies, synods, prebyteries, and sessions. To this form of government may be assigned the Scottish Church, the Lutheran, the various Presbyterian Churches, and the Methodist. Another is the independent or congregational form in which the body is self-governing, each single and local church administering its own government by the voice of the majority of its members. To this form may be assigned the Baptists, Congregationalists, Christian, and other independent churches." Thomas v. Lewis, supra.

[a] Parish and town organization.—(1) In the early history of the New England states every town was considered to be a parish as well as a town until a separate parish was formed within it (Jewett v. Thames Bank, 16 Conn. 511; Weld v. May, 9 Cush. (Mass.) 181; Brunswick First Parish v. Dunning, 7 Mass. 445), (2) and the duties of a parish were required of the town, which was obliged to maintain and support public religious worship, and perform all parish duties (Jewett v. Burroughs, 15 Mass. 464; Cochran v. Camden, 15 Mass. 296; Dillingham v. Snow, 5 Mass. 547), (3) and where one or more parishes were set off from a town, the remaining part constituted a distinct parish and was considered as the first parish (Richardson v. Brown, 6 Me. 355; Brunswick First Parish v. Dunning, supra; Minot v. Curtis, 7 Mass. 441). (4) Parishes had no powers except those given by statute, and these extended only to the settlement of ministers and building houses of public worship and to the charges arising from and necessarily connected with those objects. Dillingham v. Snow, supra; Bangs v. Snow, 1 Mass. 181. (5) To defray the expenses arising from the execution of these powers, they might raise money, by assessing it on the polls and estates of the inhabitants, and by collecting it, for which purpose the parish collector was invested with authority to compel payment (Dillingham v. Snow, supra), (6) but although a second parish was organized in a town which had managed its parochial affairs, without organizing itself as a parish, the town might still assess a tax for parochial purposes (Ashby v. Wellington, 8 Pick. (Mass.) 524). (7) It was competent for towns, before they became divided into parishes, to conduct their parochial business at meetings distinct from those of the towns (Jewett v. Burroughs, supra); (8) but generally towns thus situated transacted their parochial concerns at town meetings, making no difference in their forms when acting upon those subjects or upon matters of mere municipal or political concern (Richardson v. Brown, supra; Austin v. Thomas, 14 Mass. 333). (8) Several parishes were often incorporated within the limits of a town, and sometimes a single parish embraced parts of different towns, but when a parish was invested with all the municipal powers of a town, it did not thereupon ipso facto cease to be a parish; and the new corporation was distinct from the parish, and was not a successor to it. Dillingham v. Snow, supra.

"A church is understood, among those whose polity is congregational or independent, to be a body of persons associated together for the purpose of maintaining Christian worship and ordinances. A religious society is a body of persons associated together for the purpose of maintaining religious worship only, omitting the sacraments. A church and society are often united in maintaining worship; and in such cases the society commonly owns the property and makes the pecuniary contract with the minister. But in many instances societies exist without a church, and churches without a society." Silsby v. Barlow, 16 Gray (Mass.) 329, 330.

[§ 5] C. Compact, Constitution, and Rules[36]—1. In General. A religious association owes its existence to the compact between the members composing it,[37] and when a written constitution is finally adopted or recognized and accepted,[38] it is the embodiment of the terms of the compact by which the association was formed and by which it is to be conducted,[39] defining or limiting the powers of the local body in relation to other church bodies or judicatories and the rights of the individual members therein.[40] A religious society which has adopted the presbyterial as distinguished from the congregational form of government, has subordinated itself to the control of the supreme governing body of the general church organization of which it is a part,[41] and a religious society formed as a body free of any church control retains its independent character until its articles of association have been changed and the society has adopted for itself a changed status.[42] To be binding upon the society and its members, its constitution must not be in conflict with law or contrary to public policy.[43] An attempt at formal adoption based upon a defective notice of the meeting called for that purpose is irregular,[44] and a constitution based thereon, in the absence of evidence of subsequent acquiescence, and recognition, is not binding.[45] A constitution acquiesced in and recognized by a religious society is valid and binding,[46] although never legally adopted.[47] The society may adopt rules or by-laws for the government of its affairs which will be binding unless they are unreasonable,[48] or in conflict with the provisions of its own constitution,[49] or the general laws.[50] Where the constitution and by-laws of a church do not clearly determine the rights of parties at issue, the interpretation by the church itself, as disclosed by its own acts, will be adopted as the interpretation controlling the issue.[51]

[§ 6] 2. Alterations in General. The constitution of a religious society after it has been adopted or has been recognized as binding,[52] can be changed or amended only in the manner provided therein,[53] or by the rules and by-laws of the society.[54] So also the making of an amendment of the by-laws must follow the method sanctioned by the constitution or, in the absence of express constitutional provisions, by the usage of the society.[55] A power granted by a constitution of a church to amend or change the confession of faith, catechism, constitution and rules of discipline includes a power to adopt an entirely new constitution, rules of discipline or form of government.[56] Even where a constitution provides that no rule or ordinance shall at any time be passed to change or do away with the confession of faith, changes in the interest of clearness of expression, or fulness of statement, of the accepted doctrines of the church may be made,[57] nor does such prohibition interfere with changes in administration not affecting the articles of faith.[58]

[§ 7] 3. Power of Society or Church Judicatory To Amend. Whether the power to make changes in the constitution of a society rests with the members thereof or with some judicatory superior to the local body, and if so, with which one, depends on the terms of the organic law of the society[59] the power to make changes having been held in some instances to be in the highest church judicatory,[60] in other instances in a majority of the minor judicatories having immediate control of the local bodies,[61] and in still other instances in the local bodies.[62] Under the constitutional provision of a church that there shall be no alteration of the constitution by its highest church judicatory unless by the request of the society, the request need not originate with the members of the society, but a proposed change may be laid before the society by such judicatory; and, after the society has expressed its wish for such change, it may be made by such judicatory;[63] but where one of the proposed changes in the constitution is that such judicatory shall have power to initiate changes, the implication is that under the constitution the power does not exist, and the court has followed the practical construction denying the power to the judicatory under the constitution.[64]

[§ 8] 4. Limitations on Power. In the absence of a provision in its constitution to the contrary,[65] there must be unanimous consent of all members of a society, to an amendment of the constitution changing the fundamental faith or doctrine, and resulting in a diversion of its property to other uses;[66] and in case of a schism members adhering to the original tenets of the church are the true church and entitled to the church property even though the seceding members are in a majority;[67] but by a majority vote the church may amend its constitution in respect of administration and temporal matters or mere forms of worship not affecting religious doctrine or discipline.[68] Where a society incorporates under a general law[69] giving it a right to manage its affairs under by-laws which are reasonable and in conformity to the law, a by-law establishing a form of ritual and assuming to put it out of the power of the corporation to change it except by unanimous vote of its members is unreasonable,[70] and a minority has no power under such by-law to prevent a change adopted by the majority.[71] A provision in a church constitution requiring two-thirds vote of the whole society for an alteration of the constitution has been construed to require only two-thirds of the members voting,[72] but in some jurisdictions such a clause has been held ambiguous justifying the court in following the practical construction adopted by the church requiring a two-thirds vote of the whole society including non-voting members.[73]

[§ 9] D. Incorporation and Effect Thereof—1. Right To Incorporate—a. In General. The right to incorporate is based upon the terms of the statute under which incorporation is sought,[74] conformity to which with respect to the body or persons seeking incorporation[75] and purposes of the proposed incorporation,[76] as well as conformity to the general laws of the state[77] are required. In some states the right to incorporate is conferred by statute specifically providing for the incorporating of religious societies.[78] In other states the right exists under the general corporation law, which by its terms includes religious societies among those entitled to incorporate,[79] or the support of public worship among the purposes enumerated for which incorporation is permitted.[80] The right to incorporate under a statute giving that right to proprietors of real estate lying in common has been held to be conferred upon holders in common of church property.[81] A statute providing for the incorporation and government of churches,[82] has been held to apply to separate congregations and not to the church at large.[83] Under a statute so providing,[84] an associate body worshiping in a separate meeting-house or chapel may become separately organized and incorporated, but only with the consent of the parent society.[85] It has been held that a schismatical body within a church may incorporate,[86] but it must be done openly with the announcement of the schismatical character of the body and not under the guise of being an offshoot of the original society.[87] Under an incorporating law whose terms were permissive, not mandatory, the right to incorporate was held to be restricted to the persons or body, which under church laws and usages are vested with the administration of its temporalities.[88] A statutory provision that no religious corporation shall be recognized as existing except by express statute "of this state" has reference only to associations having temporalities to administer within the state, and does not bar the recognition of associations incorporated in other states unless they undertake to exercise their corporate franchises within the state.[89]

[§ 10] b. Constitutional Provisions. Where constitutional provisions exist restricting the establishment of religious corporations, the right to incorporate is governed thereby.[90] A constitutional restriction of the right to incorporate as a religious corporation, prohibiting such incorporation except for a limited purpose,[91] operates to bar the incorporation of religious associations as religious corporations for other than the excepted purposes,[92] but it does not bar the incorporation under the statutes of associations which are not to be classed as religious corporations.[93] The constitutional restriction does not apply to religious associations which have completed their incorporation before the time when the restriction goes into effect, and which the constitution by its terms exempts from the operation of the restriction.[94]

[§ 11] 2. Proceedings[95]—a. In General. The statutory requirements for the incorporation of a religious society[96] must be substantially followed.[97] Where the statute requires it,[98] there must be a public notice given at a stated meeting,[99] an election or appointment of the required number of trustees,[1] a certificate in proper form,[2] executed,[3] verified by affidavit,[4] and recorded by the trustees.[5] In the absence of substantial compliance, there is no corporation de jure,[6] nor will the mere declaration of the founder of the church in her deed to the trustees make it so.[7] But notwithstanding defects in the charter, it will be a corporation de jure if within the terms of a later curative statute according that status to going concerns which had previously been attempted to be formed under the laws of the state.[8]

[§ 12] b. Application. An application for incorporation should contain only the matters prescribed by law.[9] It should not contain a recital with reference to matters which are the subject of express statutory control,[10] and the inclusion of such matter in the application is ground for the court's refusal to approve.[11] In the absence of statutory requirement to the contrary,[12] it is not necessary in the incorporation of a religious society that all of the members should sign the petition.[13] But an application which does not set forth the names and residences of the subscribers thereto is fatally defective.[14] The fact that some of the applicants had previously signed an application to consolidate with another church will not affect the regularity of the proceedings.[15]

[§ 13] c. Notice. Where the statute provides for the reading of the notice by a person named in the statute as authorized to do so, at the church or meeting house, and on particular days named,[16] there must be a substantial compliance with such requirements.[17] But unless required by statute,[18] the notice of the meeting for election of trustees need not be given by any particular person,[19] and it is a sufficient reading at a church meeting to show a reading immediately after the benediction, before any of the congregation had left.[20] A statute requiring notice for the incorporation of the members of a religious society,[21] does not require notice where the incorporators are not members of a religious organization, but desire to organize a corporation in connection with a church of their own peculiar tenets to be associated therewith.[22]

[§ 14] d. Meeting for Election of Trustees.[23] Where the statute requires that a meeting of which due notice is given,[24] shall be held at the church or meeting-house for the election of trustees,[25] it is of the substance of the proceedings that the meeting be held at the church meeting-house, or other place where the congregation statedly meet for divine worship[26] and where a part of the congregation worshiped at one place and part at another, a meeting at either place, provided notice of it was duly given at both places, is a compliance with the statute.[27] If it appears that due notice was given to all and that none were excluded, the proceedings are not invalidated by the fact that the meeting was not attended by one faction of the society;[28] or by the recital in the certificate that it was composed of the male members of the congregation, although the women were entitled to participate.[29]

[§ 15] 3. Certificate and Charter[30]—a. In General. The certificate of incorporation must be executed in compliance with the statutes.[31] Where the statute so requires,[32] the certificate must be made immediately after the meeting held for the purpose of incorporation;[33] must be signed by the required number of persons,[34] must be under seal,[35] acknowledged or verified by affidavit,[36] and recorded.[37] If the statute designates the officer before whom the certificate of incorporation shall be acknowledged, an acknowledgment before an officer clearly within the designation is sufficient;[38] insufficient if before any other.[39] In the absence of statutory requirement, a seal is not necessary.[40]

[§ 16] b. Contents. Statutory requirements as to the contents of the certificate of incorporation and charter[41] must be substantially followed.[42] Where the statute so provides,[43] there must be a distinct statement of the name of the corporation,[44] the purpose for which it is formed,[45] the place where the corporate affairs are to be transacted,[46] the term for which it is to exist,[47] the number of its trustees,[48] the date of their election or appointment and the length of term for which they were elected or appointed,[49] and the facts showing a compliance with the statutory requirements for the meeting at which the trustees had been elected.[50] A charter of a proposed corporation for the support of public worship should clearly state the kind or form of worship purposed, and distinctly name the kind of church government to which it is to be subject,[51] but it is not necessary under a statute providing that the form of worship and kind of church government shall not be inconsistent with the constitution or laws of the United States or the state,[52] that the certificate should state such to be the fact, a finding of the court to that effect at the hearing upon the application being all that is necessary.[53] Depending on statutory requirements,[54] it may or may not be necessary that the charter contain provisions relating to the nature, control and disposition of its property.[55] But no provision is necessary in a charter, concerning any matter provided for by statute,[56] as, for example, the duties of officers and members;[57] nor should a charter contain anything which is properly the subject of regulation by a by-law.[58]

[§ 17] c. Acceptance by Society. The acceptance of a charter by a religious society must be by an act of the society as a body,[59] at a meeting regularly held for the purpose.[60] Individual assent thereto by each member of the society, evidenced by his signature, is not the equivalent of acceptance by act of the society.[61]

[§ 18] d. Change or Amendment of Charter. A religious corporation may at any time surrender its charter and accept a new one with other and different provisions,[62] or it may obtain an amendment of its charter,[63] provided such amendment does not alter the original principles or violate the fundamental law of the corporation,[64] or the general law or public policy of the state.[65] A charter of a church will not be amended so as to alter its original principles even on the petition of a majority of the congregation where the minority object,[66] nor can such purpose of the entire membership to alter their faith be implied from equivocal acts.[67]

[§ 19] 4. Validity; Collateral Attack. While a compliance with statutory requirements is necessary to incorporation,[68] inquiry into the validity of the charter of a religious society cannot be made in a collateral proceeding,[69] or at the instance of persons estopped to deny its corporate existence.[70] The right to incorporate cannot be attacked collaterally,[71] even though the attack is based on constitutional grounds.[72] Nor will incorporation be invalidated in a collateral proceeding on grounds of irregularity in the proceedings to incorporate,[73] as, for example, on the ground of the making of the certificate one month after the meeting, instead of "immediately" as the statute requires,[74] or by the recording officer's error[75] or failure to record,[76] or by an accidental loss of seals after they were affixed.[77]

[§ 20] 5. Name. In the absence of any statutory restriction,[78] a religious society, when it incorporates, may adopt any name reasonably appropriate to the declared purposes of the corporation,[79] subject to the rule of law that it cannot use a name to the use of which some other body, incorporated or unincorporated, has an exclusive right,[80] and subject to the discretionary power of the court to refuse to allow the new corporation to adopt a name so similar to the name of an existing corporation as to lead to confusion.[81] But the court in the exercise of its discretion has allowed a new corporation to take the name of a defunct corporation, where such action has been approved by the church judicatory, and the title to property is not affected thereby,[82] or to take the name of an unincorporated association of which the applicants for incorporation were formerly a part, it appearing that the association had no right to the exclusive use of the name,[83] and a part of a religious order on incorporating has been allowed to adopt the name of the religious order, the independent existence of the order not being affected thereby.[84] A religious corporation does not acquire an exclusive right to its name if the words used are generic in character and in common use.[85] A religious corporation has the same power to change its name as it had at first to adopt it,[86] subject to existing statutory regulations,[87] the change of name not affecting the identity of the corporation so as to prevent its holding the corporate property previously acquired.[88] An order changing the name of a religious corporation may be revoked, although there is no statutory provision in express terms authorizing it.[89]

[§ 21] 6. Proof of Incorporation; Presumptions. The certificate is proper evidence of the fact of incorporation;[90] but the record of the certificate is not, unless nonproduction of the certificate is accounted for.[91] A certificate regular in form and subsequent user of corporate rights thereunder is prima facie evidence of incorporation,[92] and failure to record the certificate of incorporation does not prevent the society from proving its corporate existence by evidence of acts of user.[93] Where the statute expressly so provides,[94] user for a specified term of years raises a presumption of legal incorporation in pursuance of the laws of the state,[95] provided the acts relied on to show user are acts pertaining particularly to corporate powers and not merely such acts as an unincorporated religious society might perform.[96] In the absence of evidence of user, no presumption of incorporation is raised by the loss of church records.[97]

[§ 22] 7. Effect of Incorporation; Reincorporation.[98] Whether the incorporated body is the religious society itself or its trustees or officers depends upon the terms of the statute,[99] the officers or trustees constituting the corporation under some statutes,[1] subject to a trust where the society or congregation is made beneficiary thereunder,[2] but the society itself remaining unincorporated.[3] A statute vesting in the trustees of a church the exclusive power of management and control[4] does not constitute the trustees the corporation.[5] Under other statutes,[6] the body corporate is the society, the trustees or other officers having only a delegated authority therefrom.[7] Under other statutes,[8] the constituents of the corporation are the petitioners for incorporation, such persons as they shall associate with them and their successors,[9] only such members of the unincorporated society being members of the corporation as are within the terms of the statutory restriction.[10] Under the statutes of some states,[11]

the corporation which is formed is a civil corporation as distinguished from an ecclesiastical corporation, having the powers of other civil corporations under the general incorporation laws so far as they are applicable,[12] corporation and church being distinct bodies with separate jurisdictions, the corporation over temporal and the church over ecclesiastical affairs,[13] the corporation being free of denominational control by the church in some jurisdictions[14] while in others, by statute, the trustees of the corporation are compelled to administer the temporalities according to the discipline, rules, and usages of the denomination to which the church members belong;[15] and under other statutes it has been held that an incorporated religious society acquires the rights and powers of a corporation for certain limited purposes, without losing its sectarian and denominational characteristics.[16] A charter granted on petition of a congregation is an incorporation of the congregation and not of the denomination.[17] A reincorporation of a religious society is merely a continuance of the old corporation,[18] unless dissolution of the old is the purpose of the reincorporation.[19]

[§ 23] E. De Facto Corporation and Estoppel.[20] A religious society which has, in good faith, attempted to legally organize as a corporation, and has long claimed and exercised the rights and powers of a corporation, is a corporation de facto, although its incorporation is technically defective.[21] The circumstances may also establish an element of estoppel to deny incorporation against a person dealing with a religious corporation as such,[22] although estoppel is not necessary for application of the doctrine.[23] Before a corporation can have a de facto existence, it must have been possible for it to be a corporation de jure,[24] and to establish a de facto status, it must show a charter or law under which a corporation might lawfully be created, a colorable and bona fide attempt to organize a corporation thereunder, and the exercise of corporate functions by the organization so formed.[25] Proof of existence of a de facto corporation is not sufficient, if there is an absence of evidence of any attempt to incorporate,[26] or, even though there is evidence of user of corporate functions if there is no evidence of a charter or law under which a corporation could be created.[27] As with de facto corporations generally,[28] a de facto religious corporation has power to sue,[29] and may be sued,[30] and may acquire,[31] and convey[32] property.

II. MEMBERSHIP[33]

[§ 24] A. What Constitutes. Who are members of a religious society must as a general rule be determined by reference to the rules, constitution, or by-laws of the society,[34] and by reference to the statutes governing such bodies in the various states,[35] and religious societies, when not restricted by their charters or articles of association, may make by-laws not inconsistent with their charter or statutes,[36] declaring what shall constitute membership applicable to existing as well as to future members.[37] Membership in a parish under the terms of varying statutes[38] has been held to be based on residence[39] and liability to taxation,[40] subject to power of the legislature to change a membership to a parish in another town, although the town boundaries are not altered and the municipal duties and rights of the member are not changed;[41] or on consent of the parties as evidenced by application for membership and acceptance by the parish.[42] Excepting the instances of residence qualification for parish membership under the statutes referred to,[43] the essence of the relation of membership in a religious society is held to be the agreement of the parties,[44] including financial support in some form when the statute requires it;[45] and generally a profession of faith,[46] adherence to its doctrines[47] and a submission to its government.[48] One accepted as a member continues to be a member in good standing in the absence of evidence of his voluntary withdrawal or proper expulsion.[49]

[§ 25] B. Rights and Duties of Member; Discipline. Every person entering into a religious society impliedly, if not expressly, covenants to conform to its rules and to submit to its authority and discipline,[50] and he has no right to insist upon the exercise of his rights as a member where such insistence amounts to an invasion and destruction of property rights of the society and of other members thereof;[51] but where the church and the church corporation are distinct bodies,[52] the discipline of a member of the church by the church will not affect his rights as a member of the church corporation in the management of the temporal affairs of the corporation,[53] nor, if it is wrongfully done, will it impose any liability upon the church corporation;[54] nor has a member of a church, even though representing the church in an official capacity, any power to bind the church corporation by his acts.[55] Where the trustees constitute the corporation,[56] members of the unincorporated society have no rights as corporate members and no standing in court as such.[57] Where the members of a congregation constitute the corporation[58] under a statute granting them limited powers,[59] members of the congregation have no power outside the powers enumerated.[60] A member of a church has not necessarily any implied authority as [a] Membership in parish based on residence.—(1) Under the earlier statutes it was held that every resident of full age within the limit of a territorial parish, if otherwise qualified, was ipso facto a member of the parish unless regularly united as a member to some poll parish, and on ceasing to be a member of such poll parish he became forthwith a member of the territorial parish within which he resided, unless such secession was fraudulent (Lord v. Chamberlain, 2 Me. 67); (2) and persons who came to reside within the limits of a territorial parish, and did not belong to any other religious society, thereby became members of such parish without application for admission or acceptance (Osgood v. Bradley, 7 Me. 411); (3) and the sons of members of a parish, on coming of age and continuing to reside within the limits of the parish, became ipso facto members of the parish (Osgood v. Bradley, supra); (4) and on ceasing to be members of such parish became forthwith members of the territorial parish within which they resided, unless such secession was fraudulent (Lord v. Chamberlain, supra; Oakes v. Hill, 10 Pick. (Mass.) 333).

[a] Membership in parish based on consent.—(1) The inhabitants of a town are not necessarily and of course members of a parish included within its limits. Bradford v. Cary, 5 Me. 339 (holding that members of an incorporated universalists' society are not members of the parish, and cannot become so except upon application and acceptance by the parish which must be in the prescribed statutory mode); Dillingham v. Snow, 3 Mass. 276 (holding that Quakers, for instance, and others exempted in conformity to their religious scruples and opinions, although members of a town, are not members of a parish comprehended by the same boundaries). (2) The relation of a member to a parish is founded on contract, and no person becomes a member until his written application has been acted upon. Sudbury First Parish v. Stearns, 21 Pick. (Mass.) 148 (holding that no person can be made or become a member of any religious society without its consent, and that too evidenced by a written application; and on the other hand, no person can thrust himself into any such body against its will, the authority to prescribe the mode of admitting members necessarily implying the power of determining whether they shall be admitted or not, which power may be exercised by a direct vote of the parish). (3) Where a person is admitted to be a member of a parish by vote and attends subsequent meetings and votes as a member, he is a member, although he may not have filed a certificate in accordance with St. (1823) c 106 (Chase v. Merrimack Bank, 19 Pick. (Mass.) 564, 31 AmD 163), (4) and that statute does not repeal St. [1811] c 6, and does not require a certificate of membership to be filed by the member, but only by his authority or subsequent ratification (Fisher v. Whitman, 13 Pick. (Mass.) 350). (5) A membership certificate is a document of which the clerk of an ecclesiastical society can give an official copy, and such a copy is sufficiently formal if made by a clerk signing his name, with the addition of "clerk" only. [a] Visitorial powers.—The male members of a congregation incorporated under an act which empow-such to bind the church to payment of expenses of an inquiry undertaken by the member in its behalf,[61] nor will the knowledge of the member of the terms of an insurance policy taken out by the member on the church be imputed to other members of the church society ignorant of the transaction.[62]

[§ 26] C. Liabilities of Member—1. For Debts of Society. A member of an unincorporated religious society not organized for gain or profit is not individually liable for its debts,[63] unless he authorized the incurring of the obligation or subsequently ratified the same.[64] A fortiori, members of an unincorporated religious society instrumental in organizing a religious corporation are not liable as members of the society for debts incurred by the corporation with persons who dealt with the corporation as such.[65] The members of a voluntary unincorporated religious society who through their trustees and priest enter into contracts are individually liable thereon,[66] as are also members of a church upon a contract adding "trustees" to their names to indicate that the legal interest is in them.[67] A member of an incorporated religious society is not individually liable for its debts, unless made so by the provisions of the charter.[68] A fortiori, private property of members of a church cannot be taken to satisfy a debt of a church corporation.[69] But when necessary to prevent a failure of justice equity will follow property of the society into the hands of its members among whom it had been divided to the prejudice of the rights of plaintiff.[70]

[§ 27] 2. Taxes and Assessments.[71] Under early statutes,[72] support of public worship was compulsory and members of parishes were liable for payment of taxes levied for that purpose.[73] Following the law governing liability of members of non-religious societies,[74] the members of a religious society are liable to assessments for support of the church[75] and the right to levy the assessments and the manner of enforcing them are governed by the charter, constitution, and by-laws of the association.[76] In the absence of any express power in the constitution authorizing assessments on members, there is an implied power to make assessments for the support of activities within the terms of the charter,[77] the amount to be determined by the membership of the society.[78]

[§ 28] D. Withdrawal and Expulsion—1. Manner and Grounds. The essence of the relation between a member and the society which he has joined being the agreement of the parties,[79] the relation can be terminated in like manner as other agreements,[80] by mutual action of the parties,[81] or where the statute so provides,[82] by the withdrawal of the member

Lewis, 6 Me. 264; Chase v. Merrimack Bank, 19 Pick. (Mass.) 564, 31 AmD 163); (2) but the remedy for satisfaction of a judgment against a parish by levy on the property of its members could be pursued against those only who were members at the time of the rendition of judgment, or, at furthest, at the time of commencement of the action (Fernald v. Lewis, supra), (3) and it was held that execution could not be levied on the property of one who was a member at the time of the rendition of judgment and ceased to be a member before the levy (Chase v. Merrimack Bank, supra), (4) and the rule was held to be further limited to members of territorial parishes not incorporated poll parishes (Richards v. Butterfield, 6 Cush. (Mass.) 191).

without subsequent action thereon by the society.[83] Persons induced by fraud to become members may on that ground have their membership canceled in a court of equity.[84] Where neither the charter nor by-laws of a corporation prescribe any particular form in which the members may resign their rights of membership, and their resignation be accepted, such resignation and acceptance may be by parol[85] or implied from the acts of the parties,[86] as by refusing to accept and act under the established confession of faith and constitution of the church,[87] the member's constitutional right to freedom of conscience and worship giving him no right to membership in a church whose faith he repudiates;[88] or, even though he has not changed his faith,[89] by withdrawing from attendance and worship, discontinuing support and uniting to establish another society.[90] And so where a member of a parish joins with others in incorporating a new society, he ceases to be a member of the parish,[91] but absence from the society, explained on other grounds, is not voluntary withdrawal.[92] Nor does the fact that a member of one of two churches tentatively becomes a member of a new organization for the purpose of bringing about a union of the two churches operate as a voluntary withdrawal from membership in the original church.[93] A mere attempt to suspend membership, in the absence of authority in constitution or by-laws for the suspension, is ineffective and members making the attempt still retain their membership.[94] And a pretended and colorable secession with fraudulent intent to accomplish thereby a transfer of property to others is ineffectual and void.[95] A division in a church as distinguished from a division from a church, does not operate necessarily as a forfeiture of membership for the members of either faction.[96] Members of both factions retain their membership even though the minority exclude the majority from possession and enjoyment of the church property,[97] or there is a conditional separation into two bodies with the consent and approval of the majority, pending a contemplated division of the property,[98] or a faction voluntarily meets in another building than the church edifice,[99] or even forms a society of its own with its own minister and officers, where the separation is explained on grounds consistent with the desire of the members to retain their membership in the original congregation,[1] or where the separation is discontinued and the separating members return to the original society,[2] or even though there is a difference of opinion as to doctrine, the constitution providing no way for determining the differences.[3]

Evidence of voluntary withdrawal. Any evidence upon which the inference of a voluntary withdrawal of members from a religious society might be based is admissible,[4] what amounts to a voluntary withdrawal being a question of law for the court.[5] Voluntary withdrawal is sufficiently shown by a certificate of the clerk of the society that the name of the member has been taken off of the membership roll at his own request,[6] but the schedule of members, as copied from the records, is not conclusive,[7] nor is a letter of dismission conclusive evidence of withdrawal.[8]

Grounds of forfeiture; expulsion. Where religious societies, not restricted by their charters or articles of association, make by-laws declaring that failure to conform thereto shall operate as a forfeiture of membership, failure to abide by the by-laws will forfeit membership.[9] In whom the power to expel a member lies depends, in the case of unincorporated societies, upon the rules and usages of the society or of the denomination to which it belongs,[10] such power having been held to be in the local congregations,[11] or, in the case of schism, in the part thereof adhering to the organization and doctrines of the church,[12] or in the deacons of an unincorporated church to whom the governing power has been delegated by the church.[13] The power to expel members cannot be arbitrarily exercised by the governing board where property rights are involved,[14] but expulsion or acts tantamount thereto, by a proper board in a proper way, will not be enjoined by the court where no property rights are involved.[15] When a vote of excommunication from a church has been passed, and the offender thereby declared to be no longer a member, the sentence may nevertheless be promulgated, by being read in the presence of the congregation, by the pastor, and will not support the prosecution of an action for libel;[16] but excommunication whether with or without authority cannot affect the expelled person's civil rights.[17]

[§ 29] 2. Rights of Member after Withdrawal or Expulsion. The rights of a member after withdrawal[18] or expulsion from a religious society[19] are to be determined by reference to its constitution and charter.[20] As a general rule the rights of a member are dependent on the continuance of his membership, and when he ceases to be a member his rights and beneficial interest in the property of the association ceases,[21] and thus an excommunicated or expelled member has no such beneficial interest in the church property as will authorize him to sue in relation thereto,[22] unless the expulsion was in pursuance of a fraudulent scheme to gain control of the property.[23] The courts have no jurisdiction over ecclesiastical processes to compel a restitution of membership privileges to an expelled member independently of violation of his constitutional rights of property and contract,[24] but his civil rights remain unimpaired,[25] as, for example, his right to maintain an action to enjoin expulsion;[26] or to compel restoration to membership, if the threatened expulsion or the expulsion had been by methods violating the constitution and rules of the society,[27] or involved the member's property or contract rights;[28] or his right to sue for libel if the excommunication was wrongful and injured him;[29] or to maintain an action for the protection of the church property, if the expulsion was in pursuance of a fraudulent scheme to obtain control thereof.[30] He has no right to recover for loss occasioned by the expulsion per se, independently of its wrongful character, such loss being damnum absque injuria.[31] An expelled member cannot maintain a suit to compel restoration to a church membership on the ground that such restoration is necessary to enable him to enjoy the right of sepulture, acquired by him as a member, such action being held by the court to be premature.[32]

III. MEETINGS AND ELECTIONS

[§ 30] A. In General. A meeting of its members properly called and organized is a necessity to the validity of any action a religious society or congregation may take wherever the constitution of the society so prescribes,[33] or wherever the action of a congregation as such is in issue,[34] although the society records of a meeting irregularly called may have value as evidence.[35] A meeting of church members is not, however, a meeting of an incorporated society with which the church is affiliated, where the two bodies are distinct,[36] and where the corporation by the terms of its constitution consists of two bodies, a meeting of one body will not be regarded as a meeting of the corporation.[37]

[36] Pittsburg Baptist Cong. v. Scannel, 3 Grant (Pa.) 48.

[§ 31] B. Organization and Conduct[38]—1. In General. The mode of conducting meetings and elections must conform to the requirements of statute or charter,[39] and where a statute and by-law are inconsistent, the statute controls.[40] Where the statute or charter is silent, the conduct of meetings and elections will be governed by rules and by-laws made by the society,[41] and in the absence of by-law a long established usage will govern.[42] The conduct of meetings and elections will not be governed by by-laws, rules, or votes outside the power of the society to make.[43] Disorderly conduct by some members present at a meeting resulting in others leaving will not invalidate the action taken, where the conduct did not amount to duress.[44]

[§ 32] 2. Enrollment and Quorum.[45] Constitutional and statutory requirements as to enrollment[46] and a quorum at meetings of a religious society must be complied with,[47] as, for example, that enrollment shall be made by a committee appointed at the meeting, and not by the person functioning as enrollment officer up to the time of the meeting,[48] that a majority[49] or two-thirds of the members shall be present.[50] A constitutional provision that the management of affairs shall be vested in the "whole congregation" is construed to mean merely that every member of the congregation shall have the right and opportunity to be present at a meeting, not that every member must be present and vote before any action can be taken.[51] In the absence of constitutional and statutory requirements and where the organization of the church is congregational,[52] or where in the case of a religious corporation the corporators are indefinite,[53] a quorum for the purposes of election and voting upon other questions which require the sanction of the members, consists of those who assemble at any meeting regularly called and warned, although such members may be a minority of the whole, in which case a majority of those who assemble may elect, unless there is a different rule established by statute or a valid by-law.[54] A statement in the minutes that a meeting was held is equivalent to a statement that a quorum was present, in the absence of any showing to the contrary.[55]

[§ 33] 3. Moderator or Chairman. Express requirements in statute or in the form of church government as to the person who shall preside at meetings must be complied with,[56] as, for example, that he shall be the pastor[57] or elder or church-warden, or in their absence a member of the society,[58] or that he shall be a member of the parish or society in charge of its temporalities when the meeting is a meeting of that body;[59] and in the latter case the pastor or rector has no right by virtue of his office to preside.[60] Prior to the election of a moderator the meeting may be called to order and the vote for moderator declared by a private parishioner who assumes that authority to himself.[61]

[§ 34] 4. Election Inspector. In religious corporations the election inspectors must finally determine upon the qualification of an elector when he offers his vote, and before he casts it; after they have received it they cannot throw it out on the ground that he was not qualified,[62] and the only duty that then remains for them to perform is to count the ballots and return the number of votes received and the names of those having the greatest number.[63]

[§ 35] C. Notice, Time, and Place[64]—1. In General. A meeting of a religious society, to be valid, must conform with the requirements of its articles of association, statute, charter or by-law in the notice given, and as to the time and place where the meeting is held,[65] although statutes are given a reasonable and liberal construction for the benefit of the churches.[66] In the absence of controlling statutory requirements, compliance with the constitution and by-laws of the society are sufficient,[67] and in absence of provision in statute, constitution, or by-laws, notice given in accordance with the immemorial usage of the society will be valid,[68] and a notice not in conformity thereto is invalid.[69] If a statute requires notice,[70] a meeting held without notice,[71] or with notice to a part but not all of the members[72] is void, although for a number of years meetings have been held without notice,[73] and the society has no power to dispense with such notice.[74] If a statute requires notice to be given by a particular person or committee,[75] the notice must be given by the designated person or committee,[76] as by the chairman and clerk of the vestry in calling a meeting of the proprietors of a Protestant Episcopal church,[77] or by the session.[78]

[a] Annual election held on movable holiday.—Where the trustees of a church were required by statute

Elections. To constitute a valid election notice must be given in conformity to the charter, constitution, and by-laws.[79] If rules provide for election on a certain day upon specified notice, an election on a different day without notice,[80] or without notice given at the time provided for[81] is void, unless it appears that the voters were fully apprised of the election and all attended and exercised their rights and the election was fairly conducted.[82] Where statute or by-laws provide that an election can be postponed only by action taken at the meeting for which the election was originally called,[83] a postponement by order of the trustees issued at a time prior to the holding of the meeting is void.[84] The election must be held at the usual,[85] or designated,[86] place of meeting, unless the usual place of meeting has been changed, in which case an election at the old place of meeting is invalid.[87] If the meeting-house where the meeting is usually held is locked, the meeting may be held at the door or at the nearest practicable place.[88] Where a church charter requires elections to be held at the annual meeting, but there is no by-law or custom proved fixing the time of the annual meeting, the validity of an election cannot be attacked on the ground that the time of meeting when the election was held did not conform to a custom followed by a faction of the church after the division.[89]

[§ 36] 2. Contents of Notice. As a general rule the notice or warrant contains a warning of such matters as will come before the meeting,[90] and it must do so when a special meeting is being called for the transaction of unusual and important business,[91] or where the statute or charter or by-laws requires it.[92] The fact that notice of a meeting of a religious corporation contained also notice of a class meeting to be held at the same time and place will not invalidate the corporate meeting in the absence of evidence that any member's rights were affected thereby.[93] But a notice which by its terms deprives members of their rights under the statute to attend the meeting and vote is invalid.[94]

[§ 37] 3. Proof of Notice. The legality of a parish meeting is sufficiently proved by showing that it was notified and warned in due form by those claiming to act as the legally qualified officers of the so-

Sterns, 21 Pick. 148); (2) but the meeting called by the justice on such application was held to be properly called and was a legal meeting, although it was not stated in the application or recited in the warrant, that there were no assessors or parish committee (Ladd v. ciety,[95] and the return of the proper officer on the back of the notice is the only proper way of showing it.[96] Where the records of the meeting do not disclose that the necessary steps were taken, there is a presumption of regularity if the meeting was an annual or stated meeting and was held at the usual place and regular time,[97] or if it appears that there was a general acquiescence on the part of the members of the society in the holding of the meeting,[98] but no such presumption attaches to a special meeting held at an irregular time and place and under the protest of some of the members.[99]

[§ 38] D. Persons Entitled To Vote—1. In General. As a general rule, unless the right to vote is otherwise restricted,[1] every member of a religious society of full age is entitled to vote[2] until he voluntarily withdraws or is expelled from the society,[3] the right to vote not extending to non-members,[4] or to minors,[5] although contributing to the expenses of the society.[6] A person whose name appears on earlier church rolls, but not on the latest, is not a member entitled to vote,[7] notwithstanding no reason appears for the omission.[8] On the other hand the fact that a person's name still appears on the roll does not give him a right to vote where it appears aliunde that he had been received into membership of another church upon letter from the minister of the first.[9] In the absence of statute, by-laws, or custom, whether a member listed on the appendix or reserve roll of a Presbyterian church is entitled to vote depends in each case on whether a withdrawal or expulsion from membership is shown.[10] But also as a general rule, the right to vote is defined in provisions by which the society is governed,[11] and in that case the right to vote is restricted to those within the terms of the governing provision,[12] as, for example, to those who have partaken of the Holy Communion in a particular church,[13] or who shall have belonged to "such church,"[14] or been members thereof for the period stated in the church constitution;[15] or who shall be contributing members and communicants;[16] or who shall have contributed to the necessary church expenses,[17] or subscribed annually, not occasionally;[18] or who shall have attended for "at least one year" or contributed,[19] stated attendance being interpreted to mean personal presence of the voter as distinguished from presence of wife or other member of the family,[20] and regular as distinguished from occasional attendance,[21] and contribution to mean something "substantial and vital,"[22] not a contribution merely for the purpose of entitling the subscriber to vote;[23] or who, for one full year prior to the meeting, "holds a single sitting, whether occupied or not, duly paid for;"[24] or in more inclusive terms, to all attendants, or communicants, or pew holders, or contributors;[25] or who, being members of a religious corporation, are connected with that particular incorporated society as distinguished from the denomination at large,[26] their right to vote under the terms of the incorporating statute not being affected by their secession from the religious faith or ecclesiastical organization of the larger body.[27] Nonresidents induced by members of a church to become members for the sole purpose of voting are not entitled to vote.[28] Under the terms of a statute giving the chairman of the meeting "the casting vote,"[29] it has been held that the chairman having already voted as a member in an election resulting in a tie, may then exercise his right under the statute to break the tie by voting as chairman.[30] Under a statute so providing,[31] the presiding officer is the final arbiter on the question of fact whether a person claiming a right to vote has been a regular attendant and contributor for the required period.[32] A restriction on membership contained in the church constitution cannot be altered by by-law.[33]

[§ 39] 2. Deprivation of Right. A deprivation of a member's right to vote has been held to result from any act of the member or of the society terminating his membership,[34] as, for example, where the member voluntarily withdraws,[35] or as a member of a faction within the church, secedes,[36] or where the fellowship of an independent religious society has been withdrawn from that member,[37] or where, by proper procedure, he has been excommunicated or expelled;[38] but not from fraudulent enrollment and rulings by the presiding officer.[39] Whether transfer of a member's name from the communion roll to the appendix or reserve roll of a presbyterian church operates as a deprivation of his right to vote, is a question of fact to be determined by the circumstances of a particular case.[40] So, also, grounds for deprivation of the right to vote may be a matter of regulation by statute, charter, or by-laws.[41] And it has been held that a by-law depriving a member of his right to vote for failure to pay his pew rent for a stated period is not inconsistent with a law restricting the vote to members.[42] But where the canons of the church give the right to vote to all church attendants or contributors or pew holders, a vote of the church depriving an attendant of his pew and refusing to accept his contribution does not deprive him of his right to vote.[43] He still may attend church, and as such attendant is entitled to vote.[44] Where no civil rights of the member are involved, acts of the pastor relating to matters of discipline only will not be enjoined by the court on the ground that such acts will result in depriving members of their right to vote.[45]

[§ 40] 3. Reception of Illegal Votes. An election will not be invalidated unless it appears that illegal votes were received,[46] and that they affected the result.[47]

[§ 41] 4. Rights of Member after Rejection of Vote. Officers of a religious society who preside at its elections and are authorized to decide on the qualifications of voters are not liable for refusing a qualified vote through error of judgment, but in good faith.[48] But an action will lie against the presiding officer of a religious meeting for wilfully refusing to receive the vote of a qualified voter,[49] provided the refusal is malicious,[50] malicious meaning from improper motives and with knowledge that no grounds for rejection existed.[51] A voter cannot object if, when his vote was challenged, he yielded to the challenge and his vote was not in fact rejected.[52] On the other hand, a member's vote unchallenged will not be subject to attack by other members who by their conduct have estopped themselves from later objecting to its legality.[53]

[§ 42] E. Number of Votes Required for Valid Action. The rules of law relating to freedom of action by independent churches and congregations are different from those rules which apply to congregations which are affiliated with and are subordinate to higher judicatories.[54] Unless a statute or church constitution otherwise provides, a majority vote at a valid meeting of a society which has adopted the congregational form of organization is sufficient to pass any resolution which the society was competent to enact,[55] and, if a quorum is present,[56] a majority of those attending the meeting and voting can so act,[57] a provision of the church constitution that "all of the members" can so act being construed as giving any member a right to attend the meeting and vote, and not as conditioning valid action upon an affirmation both by a majority of the entire membership,[58] and not as giving members attending but not voting power to block action by members voting.[59] However, when a religious society becomes affiliated with other religious societies and they unite to construct and maintain for their mutual advantage higher judicatories with constitutions of their own to which the members of the society subject themselves, then no action opposed to its obligation to continue its affiliation can be legally taken except by unanimous consent of its members and subject to the consent of the judicatory if under its constitution it has that power. A vote in favor of such action by a majority of the members of such a society is ineffective,[60] but a unanimous vote of all the members subject to the veto power of the judicatory if it has it, will be effective.[61]

[§ 43] F. Waiver of Right and Estoppel To Object. The right to object to the validity of a meeting,[62] or to the presence of a quorum,[63] or to the right of members to vote,[64] or to an election,[65] may be lost by waiver or estoppel. Waiver of notice must be clearly shown[66] as by presence at a meeting and acquiescence in its proceedings,[67] but before one can be charged with acquiescence in or recognition of an illegal election and its consequences, it must appear that he had knowledge or means of knowledge at the time of such illegality.[68] While the general rule is that one who is present at a meeting and withdraws cannot ordinarily complain as to what took place after his departure,[69] the rule is not applied where it would work a fraud upon those who had withdrawn.[70] Waiver is not shown by acts which are performed under compulsion of court.[71]

IV. OFFICERS AND COMMITTEES

[§ 44] A. Qualifications, Election, and Tenure—1. Eligibility. The necessary qualifications for election to office in a religious society are sometimes determined by statute, charter, or custom,[72] and where such provisions are shown to exist, the eligibility of candidates is governed thereby[73] as where parish[74] or church[75] membership is required by statute or charter; or, by usage, prior nomination by the consistory and announcement at a church service;[76] or ordination, in the case of deacons of a baptist church.[77] Whether a minister eligible by charter for the presidency of the corporation is thereby made eligible as trustee, is a question which has been raised but not decided.[78] In the absence of controlling provisions in statute, charter, or custom, the mere fact of nonmembership in the society,[79] or nonresidence[80] does not disqualify a person for trusteeship of the church, and, a fortiori, in a church where letters of dismission do not ipso facto terminate membership, a member who has received his letter is still eligible as trustee.[81]

[§ 45] 2. Election or Appointment[82]—a. General Rules. The rules of the church or denomination control in the appointment or election of a trustee or other officer of a religious society in the absence of controlling statutory requirement,[83] or where the statutes are so framed as to allow the churches to select their officers according to their own usages and laws,[84] a long continued usage or custom being equally binding in the absence of rule or by-law.[85] Statutory provisions relating to appointment or election of officers of incorporated societies,[86] are controlling when applicable.[87] Officers of churches following the congregational polity cannot be lawfully appointed or elected by a minority,[88] or by individual members not acting as a church or society,[89] nor does a charter procured by a minority have any effect to legalize an election held under it as against the majority.[90] Where the act of incorporation so provides,[91] an officer elected cannot exercise the duties of his office until he gives bond, approved by court.[92] Vacancies in office must be filled by new election, regardless of whether vacancy was caused by lapse of term, death, removal, or judgment of ouster.[93] Statutes providing for appointment of a trustee by the court in all cases of vacancies caused by death of a trustee, on application by the cestui que trust,[94] have been held to apply to trustees of church property, and to authorize appointment by the court on application of petitioners authorized by the congregation to represent it, alleging such facts and the death of the former trustee.[95] Where the statute so provides,[96] the number of trustees of a congregational society cannot be reduced except by vote taken at the annual meeting of the society.[97]

Certificate of Election. Under statutory requirements[98] the officers designated by the statute certify the result of the election,[99] and a certificate so issued entitles the person named therein to act.[1] But the statutory provision is merely directory,[2] and a making of the certificate at a time later than required will not prevent its use as evidence,[3] nor will a failure to furnish a certificate disqualify a person who is duly elected,[4] provided his right to the office is proven by other evidence.[5] The certificate is prima facie evidence of the election of the person named therein,[6] but only prima facie evidence,[7] and a statutory provision that the certificate of election shall entitle the party elected to the office,[8] is not construed as making the certificate conclusive evidence in case of a contest as to who the "party elected" was.[9] If the certificate discloses facts showing noncompliance with statutory requirements in the election of the trustees certified to by it as having been elected, the certificate defeats itself, and disproves rather than proves title to the office in those whom it names.[10]

[§ 47] c. De Facto Officers. To constitute one a de facto officer of a religious society he must be acting as such under color of having been rightfully elected or appointed,[11] and under these circumstances he will be recognized and treated as such by the courts,[12] during the term for which he is elected,[13] and one who has contracted with him is estopped to deny his authority to contract.[14] But where there is a de jure officer acting as such, there cannot be a de facto.[15] And a successor to the office, who has not yet qualified as a de jure officer, is not an officer de facto,[16] his predecessor being still in office.[17]

[§ 48] 3. Duration of Office and Termination of Authority. Where his term of office is not limited in time, an officer of a religious society continues in office until he is duly removed,[18] or another is appointed to succeed him,[19] and unless they resign officers or committees elected or appointed for a stated term continue in office, not only until the expiration of their terms,[20] but until their successors are selected and qualified.[21] In societies having a congregational form of government, trustees, even where their tenure has been fixed, hold office subject to the discretionary power of the majority to terminate their holding at any time and to appoint successors,[22] and the subsequent ouster or removal of their successors does not entitle the old officers to hold over.[23] An unlimited term of office may become limited by reason of a subsequent order of a superior church body providing for a stated term.[24]

Termination of authority.[25] The authority of a trustee of a religious society is terminated by his ceasing to be a member wherever a statute stipulates that membership shall be a necessary qualification for a trustee,[26] or where a statute provides in express terms that whenever a trustee ceases to be a member of the church congregation or society, he ceases to be a trustee.[27] Under the statutes, a trustee of a church ceases to be such when he unites with a church of another denomination,[28] or becomes one of the organizers and incorporators of a new church.[29] But a letter of dismission does not of itself operate to terminate the authority of an officer,[30] unless accompanied by other acts inconsistent with the performance of his duties as such officer.[31] Nor does a refusal to serve or discharge the duties of an officer in the absence of circumstances showing an intent to abandon the office and the acceptance thereof by the society as a resignation terminate the authority of the officer.[32] The statute, however, does not apply where membership in the church ceases because the church itself has ceased to exist through the action of a superior governing body.[33] Where the authority to appoint a committee is limited to appointment from the members of a particular body, a committeeman ceases to be such when he has terminated his membership in that body.[34] Where membership in a society or residence in a parish is not a qualification for election or appointment as trustee or other officer,[35] withdrawal from membership[36] or removal of residence[37] while it may be ground for terminating the authority of an officer, does not of itself so operate.

[§ 49] 4. Removal and Proceedings To Remove—a. In General. The right to remove an officer of a religious society depends upon the terms of the governing statute, charter, by-law, or custom, and of the original compact as exemplified by the form of church government which the society has adopted, or of a deed of trust constituting the organic law of the church where such deed exists.[38] In churches having the independent, congregational form of church government, the congregation has the right to remove at any time regardless of the term for which the officer has been elected or appointed.[39] In churches following the presbyterian polity, the right is vested in the superior church judicatory acting under the rules and discipline of that church.[40] In churches of the episcopal communion, the right to remove a rector[41] or clerk[42] is in the bishop.[43] The right to remove may be vested in a governing board of trustees or directors acting by majority vote, by by-law not inconsistent with church polity,[44] or under the terms of a deed of trust from the founder of the church.[45] Where the right to remove is claimed to be vested in a particular church official or board, the rules and discipline of the church upon which such claim is based must be alleged and established by proof,[46] and allegation and proof of a power of appointment does not establish a power of removal.[47]

[§ 50] b. Grounds and Proceedings. An officer cannot be removed on grounds other than those provided by the rules and discipline of the church.[48] In a congregation subject to the superior jurisdiction of the church to which it belongs, officers cannot be removed by a majority of the congregation in violation of church rules.[49] In churches of the congregational type, the congregation's power by a majority vote to remove[50] is discretionary[51] and may be exercised at any time[52] and upon any grounds not malicious, whimsical, or capricious.[53] Nor are issues of religious faith or doctrine involved, where the majority may act independently of other authority.[54] But a removal cannot be made in violation of the rules and discipline inherent in the congregational form of government,[55] or in violation of a rule adopted by the particular church.[56] Where power is granted to the governing board in a church by trust deed to declare a vacancy in any office "for such reasons as to them may seem expedient," full power exists in the governing board acting by majority vote to remove a member of a subsidiary board,[57] or even a member of the governing board itself,[58] and under the terms of the trust, their power is discretionary, not subject to court review,[59] except to determine whether the removal because of the grounds alleged or methods used was an exercise of discretion or a capricious and arbitrary act.[60] Where the power granted the governing board is to remove whenever it seems to them expedient, an officer may be removed without formal hearing[61] or even without any notice or hearing, provided only that the act of removal is an exercise of the board's judgment and not a malicious, whimsical, or capricious act.[62]

[§ 51] B. Title to Office; Direct and Collateral Attack.[63] Compliance with the requirements of statute or by-laws as to election or appointment of officers,[64] clothes the person so appointed or elected with title to the office,[65] while a failure or departure from the required procedure generally results in a failure of title.[66] Where an action to determine title to church property involves title to the office of trustee between conflicting claimants, the determination of the issue must be made by the court upon the evidence of facts concerning the elections already had and cannot be resolved by a new election held under supervision of the court.[67]

Direct attack.[68] In the absence of statutory provision to the contrary, the proper remedy to test title to an office in an incorporated religious society is by proceedings in quo warranto,[69] and the members of such corporation contesting the trustees' title will not be bound by submission of that question to an arbitrator and his award.[70] And a statute authorizing the attorney-general to proceed against one usurping a corporate office,[71] provides an exclusive legal remedy, and a court of equity has no jurisdiction of an action brought by a bishop to test the title of officers of a church corporation to their offices.[72] But title to an office in an unincorporated religious society cannot be tried by quo warranto,[73] and in England the title of a church warden to his office cannot be tested by that remedy on the ground that it is not an office of a public nature.[74] While quo warranto is the proper proceeding to test the title of an officer of a religious corporation,[75] the right of a trustee to control the church property or to use it for purposes of worship may be tested in an action in equity to restrain others usurping the office.[76] The burden of proof is upon the relators in quo warranto proceedings to establish that they have a better right to the office than the respondents.[77] A judgment of ouster against part of the trustees of a religious corporation does not invalidate the title to the office of the remaining trustees.[78]

Collateral attack.[79] The title of an officer of a church or religious society is not subject to attack in a collateral proceeding,[80] and a bill in equity will not lie to restrain his alleged illegal acts.[81] However, under a statute providing that no objection shall be allowed to any suit in chancery upon the ground that the subject of the suit is exclusively or properly cognizable in a court of law,[82] an officer's title to his office may be contested in an action in equity brought by the officer suing in his official capacity.[83]

[§ 52] C. Powers, Duties, and Liabilities[84]—1. In General. Unless the officer of a religious society is trustee under a dry or naked trust,[85] in which case he is a mere passive depositary of the property of the society with no active duties to perform or powers over it,[86] his powers are not materially different from those exercised by the managing directors of private corporations.[87] As in the case of private corporations,[88] officers of religious societies have no franchise in their offices,[89] nor are the offices regarded as tenements or hereditaments,[90] unless, as in England, with reference to certain parish offices, the incumbents hold for life and to the offices are attached certain perquisites established by immemorial usage.[91] Generally, the officers and committees appointed or elected by the society are mere agents or legal instruments to execute the will of the members,[92] intrusted with the care and management of all the temporalities of the parish or society over which they exercise jurisdiction,[93] with powers coextensive with that of the corporation,[94] and with the territorial jurisdiction conferred upon them by the canons of the church made in conformity to the laws of the state.[95] Officers must confine their official acts within the limit of their powers,[96] and an officer of a society, as well as the society itself,[97] must comply with constitutional or statutory requirements in the performance of particular acts where such exist.[98] Officers must not interfere with other officers empowered to act in other matters,[99] but where the church increases the number of officers, the rights and powers of the former officers are not affected until the additional officers are chosen.[1] Officers of an unincorporated religious society have no power to bind the other members of the society,[2] unless by the nature of the church government the trustees are regarded as the authorized agents of the aggregate body of church members.[3] Whether or not the relation between officers and the society is one of trustee and cestui que trust depends upon the terms of the incorporating act.[4] Where the officers or trustees are themselves the corporation, and the society remains unincorporated,[5] the relation of the trustees to members of the society is that of trustee and cestui que trust.[6] But where the society is incorporated and the trustees are its officers and agents,[7] the relation is not that of trustee and cestui que trustent in the narrow, technical sense, but the fiduciary or trust relation, using the word in a broader sense, existing between incorporators and officers of any private corporation.[8] Under the statutes of some states, where the society, and not the trustees, is incorporated, the trustees are made the sole managers of the corporation in respect to its temporalities[9] but with obligations to faithfully perform the duties of the office imposed on all officers of private corporations;[10] and if they are themselves the corporation and the charter gives them that power, they have full control and management of the temporalities,[11] subject in such case to the obligation of trustees to the unincorporated society as their cestui que trust.[12] But a statute which vests in the trustees of a church the exclusive power of management and control does not constitute the trustees the corporation.[13] Whether ecclesiastical officers have powers over the temporalities of a church depends on the provisions of ecclesiastical law and of state statutes.[14] A court has no power by its order to validate the act of an officer beyond his power to perform,[15] nor can a society by ratification on the part of any number of its members acting individually legalize an officer's illegal act.[16]

[§ 53] 2. Use and Possession of Church Property. By virtue of their office, trustees or other officers of a religious society are entitled to possession of all the church property,[17] including the church records and corporate seal,[18] which ceases upon termination of their authority;[19] and, except in the case of a dry or naked trust,[20] they have full control and management of the property,[21] subject to a trust in favor of the congregation[22] or members of the society where such trust exists,[23] or to the control of superior ecclesiastical officers or judicatories in churches of the presbyterial or episcopal form of government,[24] the acquiescence of the trustees in a particular use not being regarded in such cases as a breach of trust where the judicatory has failed to act on the matter.[25] Church officers holding a church property in trust for the members of the society must protect the property against an unlawful invasion of the rights of the majority by the minority,[26] but they have no power to close the church against the wishes of a minority who desire to continue to worship there in accordance with the terms of the trust,[27] even though the church is without a minister to direct the services;[28] but where under the terms of the original compact or agreement,[29] or under the canonical usages or regulations of the church, a religious corporation has absolute title to the church property not subject to a trust in favor of members of the congregation worshiping therein, the officers of the corporation acting for it may close the church against the protest of members of the congregation,[30] or prevent any other use of the church property by members of the congregation which the officers prohibit.[31] Where trustees hold the church property in trust for members of the society or congregation, the members may confirm and ratify unauthorized acts of the trustees.[32] While right to possession of the church edifice gives the trustees only a constructive possession, they are held prima facie to be in actual possession if they have the key.[33] An officer's right to possession of the church property at the end of his administration passes to his successor.[34]

Private proprietary chapels. The rule giving trustees the right to possession and control of church property,[35] has no application to a private unconsecrated chapel, title and control of which remains in the owner although dedicated by him to the performance of divine service according to the ritual of a particular denomination.[36]

[§ 54] 3. Removal of Persons from Church Building.[37] Trustees having a right to possession and control of church property,[38] have a right to remove any person from the church building who has not a superior right,[39] and may use the force necessary to remove a person who is disturbing a meeting of the society in violation of its rules,[40] even though the interruption is not willful,[41] without rendering themselves liable to an action for assault and battery.[42] The right to remove is conditioned on the acts objected to constituting either a disturbance of a religious meeting within the legal meaning of that term,[43] or a violation of the regulations of the church governing their meetings for worship.[44] A person present at the meeting who is conducting himself peaceably and who claims that he is lawfully entitled to be present and has an apparent right, cannot be removed[45] even by the order of the presiding officer.[46]

[§ 55] 4. Care and Management of Funds. An officer having charge of funds belonging to or contributed for the church, whether he be the treasurer of the church[47] or of one of the subsidiary organizations in the church[48] is liable to the church for diversion of the funds to purposes other than those designated by the contributors thereof,[49] or for refusal to account therefor;[50] and he cannot justify his refusal on the ground that they were contributed for a specific purpose connected with the church activities.[51] But an officer who has received money for the church may defend in an action of assumpsit for money had and received if, before the commencement of the action, he had paid over the money to the church officer in charge of church funds.[52] Contributors to a society fund are entitled to a return of property and money fraudulently secured from them, and may hold the officer guilty of the fraud personally liable therefor.[53] While the court has no authority to control the discretion of the officers of the church in the management of its funds, so long as the charter is not violated,[54] under the statutes of some states,[55] they may apply to the court for aid and direction in respect to investment of such funds.[56] A bequest of money made to a church without designating the particular officer to whom payment shall be made is payable to the one who ordinarily receives and keeps the funds of the church.[57]

[§ 56] 5. Contracts and Indebtedness—a. Power To Contract. Trustees of a religious society are presumably authorized to contract debts and execute contracts where there are such trustees and no evidence of a custom to the contrary;[58] and where they are expressly given that power by statute, it cannot be cut down by evidence of a custom to the contrary with respect to certain kinds of contracts.[59] The power of officers of a religious corporation to contract in its behalf is limited to the power granted to such officers by the terms of its charter.[60] Where the trustees themselves constitute the corporation, they alone have power to represent it in making contracts.[61] Such power does not exist in unauthorized members of the vestry,[62] nor is the rector of a protestant episcopal church acting as president of the vestry, in the absence of evidence of what the usual functions of the president of vestries of protestant episcopal churches are,[63] nor is the president,[64] secretary,[65] or treasurer[66] of a religious corporation, unless specially authorized by the board having the power.[67] In Canada, church wardens, in their corporate capacity,[68] or representing an incorporated church,[69] may contract for the church, but church wardens of an unincorporated church may not.[70] Where the power to contract is in a board or committee, such board or committee may delegate the power to one of its members,[71] or to an officer,[72] and may prescribe the extent of the delegated power.[73] An oral delegation is sufficient,[74] but the burden of proving the delegation of authority is on the party asserting the validity of the contract.[75] Trustees having power to contract are not thereby given power to allow claims against the society which are barred by the statute of limitations.[76]

[a] Insistence on occupying particular seat.—The mere fact that a member of the congregation insists on sitting on a camp stool in the aisle when there is room for him in a pew does not justify his expulsion from the building by force, unless it further appears that a regulation of the church was being violated, that the violator had been requested to desist, but refused, and that persistence in such conduct was disturbing to others in the meeting. [§ 57] b. Limitations on Exercise of Power.[77] Trustees, committees, or other officers empowered to enter into contracts must keep within the scope of their authority in order to bind the society,[78] and their acts are binding only when they are the official acts of the board or committee,[79] performed at an authorized meeting held in pursuance to a call addressed to all of its members,[80] at which a quorum was present,[81] within the scope of the chartered purposes of the society,[82] and in conformity to its rules and discipline,[83] and the limitations and requirements of its constitution.[84] But a religious society will be bound by a contract so made,[85] or by the terms of an unauthorized contract if its duly authorized officers have ratified it.[86] But ratification by such officers, if express, must be official,[87] and, if inferred from conduct, must be shown to have been based upon their knowledge of the unauthorized act,[88] and such knowledge is not established by evidence of equivocal facts.[89]

[§ 58] 6. Individual Liability.[90] An officer of a religious society may become individually liable with respect to transactions where in breach of his duty he has acted in his own interest and in opposition to the interest of the society,[91] or by his fraudulent dealings with members of the society he may assume towards them the liabilities of a constructive trustee.[92] Following the rule of agency as to the individual liability of an agent on contracts of the principal,[93] it is held that the individual liability of trustees or other officers of a religious society on contracts not sealed depends on the disclosed intention of the parties,[94] the officer being held individually liable where such was the intention of the parties when they entered into the contract,[95] and not individually liable where the contract was negotiated on the sole credit of the society.[96] And so trustees of an incorporated religious society are not personally liable on corporate contracts executed by them as trustees in the absence of evidence that the contract was entered into on the personal credit of the trustee.[97] Where a religious society is unincorporated, the society not being liable,[98] the members who assent to the contract or subsequently ratify it,[99] or the officer,[1] or the members of the committee who execute it,[2] are individually liable but not officially liable,[3] their individual liability in certain cases being restricted to a particular fund on the sole credit of which the creditor is shown to have contracted.[4] But an officer of an unincorporated society who had no part in the making of the contract is not personally liable thereon.[5] Officers of an unincorporated society negotiating a contract on false representations that the society was incorporated, are personally liable.[6] Officers not individually liable on contracts executed in behalf of the society,[7] do not incur such liability because they thought they were liable and later so expressed themselves,[8] or because an earlier contract on which they were personally liable had been merged into the later contract which they had signed as trustees.[9] Nor can an officer be held personally liable for church indebtedness incurred by another officer in the absence of evidence of agency or ratification,[10] nor is agency in administration of the temporal affairs of the church established by proof that the latter was subject to ecclesiastical control of the former.[11] But trustees are individually liable on contracts which they had no authority to make[12] unless the party with whom the trustees dealt had full knowledge of the trustee's lack of authority and there was no express undertaking on the part of the trustee that he would be individually liable,[13] or on bonds executed by them in their individual capacity with their official designations superadded,[14] or on acceptance of a contractor's order signed by a trustee individually before the society's obligation to the contractor had matured,[15] or with respect to indebtedness which the statute obligates them as individuals to pay.[16] A trustee of a religious society is not individually liable for torts committed by his predecessor in office, in the absence of evidence that he was connected with or participated in the wrongful act.[17] While a trustee of an unincorporated religious society may be individually liable in tort under certain circumstances,[18] he cannot be held liable in his official capacity, the society itself not being liable.[19] It has been held that under statutory provisions churchwardens may be sued in their individual names with the addition of the name of their office on contracts entered into for the church by their predecessors in office, although there was no personal liability of the churchwardens involved.[20]

[§ 59] D. Compensation and Reimbursement for Expenses.[21] In the absence of contract, the right of an officer of a religious society to compensation for services rendered depends on the usage in like cases.[22] Where the rendering of services gratuitously is shown to be the established custom, compensation will not be allowed, in the absence of contract, to a trustee of a religious society,[23] or to the treasurer of a church.[24] Nor in such case will liability be imposed on the society by recognition by trustees individually of the officer's alleged moral right to such compensation.[25] On the other hand, the hiring by one trustee of a sexton to care for the church property, and the acceptance of his services without objection by the church, places upon the church corporation the obligation to pay for them.[26] An officer of a religious society is entitled to reimbursement for expenditures and disbursements made in the performance of official duty in good faith and with reasonable prudence,[27] but not to a lien on the church property to secure its repayment.[28] He is not allowed reimbursement for expenditures which are not properly chargeable against the society.[29]

V. POWERS AND LIABILITIES OF CHURCH OR SOCIETY

[§ 60] A. In General. As a general rule, a church or religious society, subject to constitutional or statutory restrictions,[30] or to charter limitations on its power to act if incorporated,[31] has power to manage all its temporal affairs through its proper officers,[32] and like other corporations[33] is liable for the acts of its officers done in its behalf within the scope of their authority,[34] but not for negligence[35] or trespass,[36] or fraud,[37] or other tort[38] of its trustees outside the scope of their authority, nor for negligence of an employee within the scope of his employment where due care was used by the society in his selection,[39] except in particular classes of negligent acts where a statute is construed not to exempt religious corporations from the general rule of liability for negligence applicable to all corporations.[40] In the absence of fraudulent conduct on the part of its officers, the acts of the society are not subject to rescission by members of the society.[41] A religious society, although unincorporated, has a right to keep the organization intact, and is not at the mercy of a minority who desire to break up the church.[42] But a religious corporation has, in the absence of permission in its charter, no power to engage in commercial enterprises,[43] although when it owns shares in a business corporation, it may vote such shares by proxy at an election for directors.[44] In England, by statute, this disability to engage in commercial pursuits is extended to "spiritual persons," exempting such as are partners in a banking firm or other enterprise for profit from any personal liability on the partnership account.[45]

[§ 61] B. Church or Denominational Rules, Regulations, and Usages. Religious organizations have the right to prescribe such rules and regulations for the conduct of their own affairs as they may think proper, if not inconsistent with the constitution and law of the land,[46] independent churches being subject, each to its own rules,[47] and associated churches, each to the rules of the associated body and to its own rules so far as they are consistent therewith,[48] and the associated body to its rules;[49] and, subject to the qualification referred to,[50] the courts will give effect to such rules and regulations.[51] Incorporation does not take away the power of the society to transact its secular business according to the methods and customs of the particular communion or denomination to which it belongs,[52] a church of the congregational type having power to act through a majority vote of its congregation after incorporation as well as before,[53] especially where the trustees acquiesce in such action.[54] Powers guaranteed to a religious society by a state constitution are not affected by denominational rules and practices inconsistent therewith, where its property is held free of any trust for the support of religious worship according to the discipline of a particular denomination.[55]

[a] Reason for rule.—"The organization is a missionary one, and there is no allegation of any kind that it has any fund other than that for the maintenance and support of the charity. It has no capital stock, no financial return is made to its members, and, as far as appears, its officers serve without remuneration. Under such circumstances it is merely an instrument of law to accomplish a certain object. The donors of its fund have selected it as a trustee for this object, and the estate, property and revenue in its hands are impressed with the trust for that purpose, and it does not seem to me to be lawful to divert them to any other, and, consequently, none of these funds can be diverted to the payment of damages for a personal injury received by a stranger at the hands of an agent not shown to be unworthy or unfit for the purposes for which he was employed." It is peculiarly within the province of the Legislature to determine questions of public policy. "For its own internal order, and for the mode in which it fulfils its functions, it is to be a law unto itself, or have its law within itself, provided it keep within the bounds of social order and morality. This is the same rule that the law applies to individuals in their contracts about legitimate business. Their contracts and their own interpretation of them, so far as they can be ascertained, and the customs of the trade in which they are engaged, are the elements out of which we derive the law of the case which they present for our decision." They may organize as independent churches, and then their law is found in their own separate institutions, customary or written. Or they may organize as associated churches, and then their law is to be found in their own rules, and in those of the associated organism. When persons join a church belonging to such a general organism, they assent to its laws, and are entitled to the implication that the affairs of the church are to be managed according to them." [§ 62] C. Contracts and Indebtedness—1. In General. The general rules governing private business corporations in the making of contracts and incurring indebtedness[56] apply to religious societies and corporations.[57] The authority of a religious corporation to contract is measured by its charter or organic law,[58] its powers being conferred expressly[59] or by implication.[60] By charter or statute[61] its power to contract may be limited as to the nature and purpose of the contract which it may make,[62] or in the amount of indebtedness which its trustees may create without the vote or sanction of the society.[63] When incorporated, the construction of a church building and the making of contracts relating thereto,[64] and repairs and improvements of the church property[65] are within its corporate powers, and the corporation is subject to the liabilities resulting from the exercise of such powers.[66] Also, religious associations having under the statute a legal existence and entity for the restricted purpose of holding real estate, although not incorporated,[67] have an implied power to make contracts necessary in the improvement of such real estate.[68] Unincorporated religious societies being incapable of making a contract, are not liable on contracts made by its officers or members,[69] and its members or agents are individually liable as joint promisors or partners.[70] Where the society is a corporation aggregate,[71] and has a board of trustees to manage its affairs,[72] it can contract only through the aggregate body by vote, or through the board of trustees by vote, or through an agent authorized by vote of one body or the other,[73] or in the case of a corporation organized merely to hold title, by the religious or denominational body by whom and for whose purposes the corporation has been created and is governed and sustained.[74] When a church and society are an existing organized association, acting in a collective quasi-corporate character,[75] the society is bound by acts of the majority of its members.[76]

[§ 63] 2. Essentials and Limitations of Liability.[77] Like other corporations,[78] religious corporations are generally bound by the acts of their agents, acting within the apparent scope of their authority,[79]

VI. SUPERIOR, ASSOCIATED, OR REPRESENTATIVE BODIES AND OFFICERS

[§ 65] A. Relation between Society and Church in General. A religious society may be independent of any church. Its relations to a church or to a denomination are such as it chooses. It may choose none.[97] Having made a choice, it may later change it if it has not irrevocably surrendered its right to do so.[98] A society which has made its choice in favor of the congregational system, retains its independence of other religious bodies, and may govern itself by its own rules.[99] And where the society owns the land and meeting house and has retained its independence of any church, and neither church members nor pewholders are ipso facto members of the society, the society by vote of its own members may determine the form of worship and its own policy as to the minister to be called and its church affiliations, even against the wishes of a majority of church members or pewholders worshiping in the society's house but who are not members of the society.[1] Correlatively, the church or ecclesiastical body is a separate and distinct organization from the society and independent thereof,[2] and property given absolutely to the church it holds as its property free from the control of the society.[3] The independent relation between church and society or parish may, however, be so far affected by the uses and trusts on which property is granted as to make the identity of the church in relation to the church property dependent on its continued connection with the parish,[4] in which case a minority of the original church remaining in the parish is the church under the terms of the grant as against the majority moving out of the parish.[5] A society, at the time it organizes, may choose to surrender its independent character and to become a part of a larger church or denominational organization;[6] that choice may be established in proof by parol evidence of circumstances, a written compact or constitution not being required.[7] Where a society has once attached itself to a particular denomination, in order to maintain its status as a church of that denomination it must preserve an ecclesiastical connection with and subordination to the superior bodies, as prescribed by the rules of the superior bodies.[8] Where the church is an integral part of the general organization, and has a direct, inherent, and organic interest in that body, it is forever a part of it, except where its rights are forfeited by a regular judicial decree,[9] or the connection is broken by mutual consent of society and the superior body,[10] a society even though it has voted in favor of secession still remaining a part of the larger body until the secession has been acted upon by the larger body in conformity to its own rules.[11] But where the connection between society and superior body is shown to be purely voluntary, and there is no provision to the contrary in the church rules, it may be severed by the society without the consent of the superior body,[12] especially where the superior organization is merely an advisory body to a confederation of local self-governing churches,[13] and in such case a severance of the connection is effected by notice of withdrawal.[14] Where the original compact between members of a religious society and the terms of the trust on which its property is held require that it shall always adhere to a particular creed or system of doctrine and church polity and that the society shall always be connected with an orthodox synod, the society is at all times free by majority vote to change its synodical connection to another orthodox synod,[15] but a majority has no right to change the faith and doctrine to which the society was committed by its original compact.[16] The freedom of incorporated religious societies to change their denominational connections has been affected by statutes in some jurisdictions,[17] a majority of the members of a corporation having power at any time to sever their connection with the superior body under an early New York statute providing that a religious society shall not be subject to denominational control,[18] but where the charter embodies the original purpose of the incorporators to become connected with a superior church organization, and such connection is made, it cannot later be dissolved by action of the majority.[19] Where a connection is once established between a society and a superior church organization, it is presumed, in the absence of proof to the contrary, to have no right to sever the connection, except by mutual consent.[20]

[§ 66] B. Powers. In a congregational religious system, it is generally held that an association or conference of churches has no supervision, control, or governmental authority of any kind over the individual congregations,[21] and the right of an individual congregation to govern itself in accordance with its own by-laws[22] and by majority vote of its own members[23] is not affected by its adherence to or rejection of the discipline adopted by a conference of the churches, and by majority vote, it may withdraw therefrom at any time, and such withdrawal will be effective even though not in conformity with the rules of the conference regulating withdrawal of churches.[24] But the reasoning of the Massachusetts cases in which the terms of grants of property to a congregational church have been held to impose restrictions upon its power to act independently by a majority vote of its members,[25] have been so far followed in some cases that a constitution of a congregational church vesting its government in the body of believers who compose it and declaring an "organic relation" of mutual counsel and coöperation to exist between church and an association and conference of churches has been held to limit the governing power, at least in the calling and ordaining of ministers, to a majority of those coöperating with the association.[26] In the presbyterial and episcopal systems, where the governmental control over the individual congregation exists and is more or less centralized in superior ecclesiastical bodies, the powers of the superior body are defined and limited by the terms of its constitution,[27] the source of such power being the ecclesiastical as distinguished from municipal law.[28] When authorized by its organic law, and subject to the limitations therein contained, the superior body has power to provide means for the amendment of its constitution and confession of faith,[29] and to either divide or to submit a plan for the division of the church into two parts,[30] to provide a plan for union with another church,[31] to elect trustees of a subsidiary institution according to the terms of an endowment or statute;[32] to recognize one of two rival factions;[33] to depose officers of local churches,[34] and to construe the confession of faith and to determine whether certain doctrines are in conflict with such confession.[35] Although a superior body may have power to amend the constitution and confession of faith,[36] and to effect a union of churches of different faiths under a common confession of faith,[37] it has no power to divert trust property pledged to the maintenance of the original confession of faith of either one of the churches, and to prevent such diversion the court will inquire into matters of doctrine and faith while it would have no power to do so if property rights were not involved.[38] When a superior body is acting within the scope of its authority, its orders and judgments are binding on subordinate bodies,[39] and a subordinate body may be expelled from the organization if it disobeys.[40] But the superior body has no power to control outside of its authority to act,[41] or after a severance of the connection between the individual church and superior body has been effected;[42] nor has an intermediate body power by its unauthorized acts to bind the supreme body.[43] However, proceedings had without authority by an intermediate church organization may be ratified and validated by the supreme body, provided the latter body does not violate the discipline of the church.[44] Under a statute,[45] an ecclesiastical governing body may dissolve a church as a spiritual body,[46] but it has no power to dissolve the corporation considered as a legal entity,[47] although it may still direct the denominational uses to which the corporation as trustee shall apply the property.[48] Under other statutes,[49] the superior body may take possession of the property of extinct churches,[50] but such a provision gives it no power to decree the dissolution of a church[51] and then take possession of its property, the statute having no application to a case where extinction was forced upon the church.[52] In cases where withdrawal of a society from the superior church body can only be made effectual by consent of the superior body,[53] the superior body may give or withhold its consent.[54]

[§ 67] C. Meetings—1. Conduct in General. A meeting convened with a jurisdictional basis in the church statute is entitled to the presumption of regularity.[55] A meeting called at a time and place in accordance with the requirements of the church discipline is valid, and action taken at such meeting is valid as against action taken by another faction at a meeting called at a different time and place not in accordance with the church discipline.[56] Where the church discipline provides that the time and place of a particular meeting shall be determined by certain designated agencies, the appointing a time and place is an administrative function, and may be delegated by the bodies named in the church discipline to another subordinate body.[57] A presiding officer of a superior ecclesiastical body is not a necessary part of that body. A superior body, legally constituted, may function legally without him.[58] Nor does his presence as presiding officer confer authority to act upon a body illegally constituted.[59] A rule of a superior body providing for selection of its presiding officer at a particular point of time in the proceedings may be suspended by the superior body and the selection postponed to a later time.[60]

[§ 68] 2. Delegates and Representatives. The status of a lay representative to a synod is not a civil but an ecclesiastical one, and an alleged interference with a lay representative's right to hold his office cannot be made ground for injunction in the civil courts.[61] After a church body has been exscinded by a superior church body, its representatives have no right to participate in the proceedings of the latter organization,[62] and a congregation is not chargeable with the acts of its delegates to the superior bodies, when, under the rules of the denomination, it has no voice in their election.[63]

VII. MINISTERS

[§ 69] A. Definitions—1. Minister. A minister is one who, having been ordained to the ministry, undertakes to perform certain services for another. As distinguished from pastor, it implies performance of a casual service, a "ministration."[64] It includes a bishop whenever officiating as minister in the service of the Holy Communion,[65] a lecturer who performs the services of a minister in the place of the regularly appointed minister,[66] a deacon[67] or a priest[68] who has conferred on him, by a general ordination, the investment of ministerial functions, even though he is not by that act placed over a particular church.[69]

[§ 70] 2. Minister of Gospel.[70] "Minister of the gospel" within the meaning of the marriage acts requiring one to be such before he can be licensed to marry,[71] is construed broadly to refer to ministers of any form of religion or faith,[72] but that although it is not necessary that he should be the pastor of any congregation in particular, it is required that he should be something more than a preacher merely. He must have the faculty, according to the constitution of his church, to celebrate matrimony, and, to some extent at least, the power to administer the christian sacraments, as acknowledged and held by his church.[73]

[§ 71] 3. Minister of Religion.[74] A "minister of religion" within the meaning of the statute exempting such from military service,[75] has reference to one authorized to preach and regularly employed in the discharge of ministerial duties regardless of whether or not he is compensated therefor.[76]

[§ 72] 4. Ordained Minister.[77] An "ordained minister" is one consecrated to the ministry by some act of admitting and setting apart,[78] but within the meaning of the marriage acts requiring one licensed

Wood, [1917] 2 K. B. 885; Chauncey v. Peters, 87 L. J. K. B. 833), (2) to a lay reader (Simmonds v. Elliott, [1917] 2 K. B. 894), (3) or missionary of a seamen's friend society (Bratt v. Auty, 87 L. J. K. B. 305), (4) or to a grocer elected minister who performed the ministerial function but without ordination and without salary (Nock v. Malins, 87 L. J. K. B. 62), (5) or to a draper elected an elder without salary (Kipps v. Lane, 86 L. J. K. B. 735, 116 L. T. Rep. 95), (6) or to an evangelist licensed to preach, but not to administer the sacraments (Flint v. Courthope, 87 L. J. K. B. 504; Robins v. Wood, 87 L. J. K. B. 224).

to marry to be an ordained minister,[79] not confined to the christian ministry.[80]

[§ 73] 5. Pastor. A pastor is a minister who has been "installed according to the usage of some christian denomination in charge of the specific church or body of churches."[81] A distinction exists as between pastor and priest, priest having reference to a position with spiritual power regardless of locality, while the pastor is a priest placed in charge of a certain parish.[82]

[§ 74] 6. Settled Minister.[83] Under statutes exempting settled ministers from taxation,[84] a "settled minister" is one ordained in some particular society, incorporated or unincorporated, which shall be entitled to his services and obligated to him for his support,[85] even though his employment changes from one society to another in the same town,[86] and even though he is a deacon, merely, ordained and licensed to preach, but not authorized to administer the Lord's Supper,[87] and has no fixed salary but is supported by voluntary contributions.[88] The term "settled minister" does not include an ordained minister who merely resides in town but whom no religious society in the town is obligated to support.[89]

[§ 75] 7. Stated Minister.[90] Statutes regulating the solemnization of marriages have variously named the person authorized by law to administer the ordinance of marriage.[91] Within the meaning of these statutes, a "stated and ordained minister of the gospel" is held to include a person ordained to the ministry generally, and later engaged to preach in the town where he is licensed to marry.[92] A travelling circuit preacher on a circuit of several towns is not a stated or settled minister within the meaning of the marriage acts.[93]

[§ 76] 8. Stated Supply. A "stated supply" is a term used in the presbyterial forms to apply to a missionary employed by the presbytery and assigned to a particular mission church. He is distinguished from a pastor, "called" by the congregation subject to confirmation of the presbytery.[94]

[§ 77] 9. Teacher of Piety, Religion, and Morality. A "teacher of piety, religion and morality" within the meaning of a Bill of Rights is a minister of the gospel.[95]

[§ 78] B. Ordination, Call, Employment, or Settlement—1. In General. The rules and usages of the church determine the legal method of electing or appointing its minister,[96] except where they conflict with the constitution or statutes of the state in which the church is located.[97] Where the denomination has no rule for the appointment of ministers or priests, and the society is incorporated, its board of trustees is the proper body to exercise the power of appointment.[98] In the absence of a positive ecclesiastical rule, the entire absence of any ceremony of induction does not affect the right of a rector or minister to his position.[99] Where under a trust deed the right to nominate a minister for settlement is vested in a particular person, a nomination purchased for a certain sum of money is void.[1]

[§ 79] 2. Ordination and Reordination. Ordination is not the equivalent of election or appointment.[2] If the election is invalid, a subsequent ordination vests the incumbent with no title.[3] Nor is reordination necessary each time a minister, once ordained, is settled over a church,[4] or where he transfers his ministry from the protestant episcopal to the presbyterian church.[5]

[§ 80] 3. Rules and Usages of Particular Churches.[6] Congregational. In a church maintaining an organization independent of other churches or of denominational connections, the majority of the members of the church and society, not the session or trustees, elect the pastor.[7] In the baptist churches of early New England maintaining the dual form of organization, church and society, it has been held that both church and society must concur in calling and settling a minister,[8] but that after a formal call by the church, concurrence of the society may be proved by records recognizing him as filling that office, coupled with proof that he actually performed

"The term teacher was made use of as nomen generalissimum, to embrace the clerical head of every denomination of Christians in the state. It was well known, that, in early times, certain titles used in the established church were offensive to our modest ancestors, as savoring of ecclesiastical distinction, and that the terms teach, teaching elder, teaching officer, &c., were commonly used, in lieu of other official designations known in the English church. By a colonial law of 1668, it is provided, that teaching officers of churches should be the ministers to all the inhabitants of the towns in which the churches over which they are placed shall be planted. If a teacher of piety, religion and morality, in the sense of the Declaration of Rights, does not mean ministers of the gospel, then the provision is senseless and nugatory; for there was not then, nor is there now, any such officer known in the parishes or churches." the duties thereof.[9] Where the church property is held by trustees in trust for the congregation, the majority of the congregation have the power to appoint the minister,[10] but the power must be lawfully exercised at a meeting duly called, and an alleged appointment on any other basis is no appointment at all.[11]

Presbyterial. According to the usage and form of government of the presbyterian church, the selection of the pastor is primarily in the congregation, but must be approved by the presbytery and accepted by the minister.[12] But a "call" by the congregation in itself is merely tentative,[13] and the formal sanction of the presbytery and acceptance of the call by the minister are essential to the consummation of the pastoral relation.[14] It has even been held that after confirmation by the presbytery and acceptance of the call by the minister, there must still be installation by the presbytery,[15] and that in the absence of installation, the presbytery may reconsider its action, reject the candidate, and prevent his further officiating as minister.[16] A "stated supply" is not a pastor.[17] His selection is made by the presbytery without a "call" from the congregation, and he is subject at all times to its control.[18]

Episcopal. In a church which has entered into voluntary association with the evangelical association where the itineracy of the clergy and the absolute power of the bishops over the appointments of the preachers for the various churches is a distinctive feature of the discipline, the trustees and congregation of a local church have no power in regard to the selection of its pastor,[19] subject only to the limitation that the appointing bishop shall be the presiding bishop of a conference that shall be itself a legally constituted body.[20] This rule applies to appointment of preachers to local churches in the methodist episcopal church.[21] Under the canons of the episcopal church requiring a bishop to consult the churchwardens and lay representatives of the parish before appointment of a rector to a vacancy, an appointment without prior consultation is not a lawful appointment.[22] In England, a curate is first appointed by the rector to assist him.[23] His appointment is then certified by the rector to the bishop.[24] Then, but not until then, he is eligible for ordination by the bishop.[25]

[§ 81] 4. State Constitutions, Statutes, and Charters—a. In General. The civil law of the state, in the form of constitution, statute or charter, controls if in conflict with a church law or canon,[26] unless by the terms of a trust deed an appointment thereunder is made subject to the church law.[27] So a state law incorporating all vestries of episcopal churches, and investing them with power of appointment and removal of ministers[28] prevails over a church canon placing that power in the bishop of the diocese.[29] And a right to appoint in conflict with church law cannot be grounded on an old state law which has been abrogated.[30] But where there is ambiguity in the state law, it will be construed to avoid a conflict with the church law,[31] especially where the obscure enactment is an amendment of a church charter which itself recognizes the church law as controlling.[32] Where the legislature has conferred on the church corporation unconditionally the power of disposing of the right of presentation,[33] any by-law passed by the corporation in the exercise of that power is valid,[34] and the terms of the by-law are a matter within the discretion of the corporation.[35] The power of a religious corporation to contract for the services of a minister depends on the terms of its charter.[36] In the absence of express power to contract, no implied power can be based upon the power granted by the incorporating act to tax pews for enumerated purposes of which the support of a minister is not one.[37]

[§ 82] b. New York Rule. Where, as in New York, the state statute provides that the officers of a religious corporation shall administer the temporalities according to the rules of the church or denomination to which the corporation belongs,[38] the church law is supreme by force of the statute itself,[39] and the trustees cannot lawfully maintain in office a minister who has been deposed by a superior body of the denomination, which has the power of removal under the church law,[40] or without the approval of the bishop or without prior notice to him of the proposal to elect him as required by the church canons,[41] nor refuse to receive a minister lawfully appointed by a bishop having that power under the church law.[42] The early law in New York, which this statute changed, gave to trustees who were invested by statute with the management of the temporal affairs of the corporation the power of determining who should occupy the pulpit.[43]

[§ 83] c. Massachusetts Rule. In New England it was the custom in early times for a church to first nominate a minister and then submit the nomination to the parish for approval.[44] But it is provided in the Massachusetts Declaration of Rights that the town, parishes, and other religious societies shall have the exclusive right of electing their public teachers,[45] and when this right is insisted upon, it supersedes the ancient usage and renders unnecessary the concurrence of the church in the choice of a minister.[46] Nor is the constitutional right of a religious society by a majority vote of its members to elect its pastor or religious teacher affected by its acceptance of gifts and donations free from express trust or condition,[47] and a simple declaration implied from the fact that it was a presbyterian church and called itself such, and that it had adopted by-laws stating that the polity of the presbyterian denomination as to selection of ministers would be followed, cannot be regarded as an abandonment of its constitutional powers.[48]

[§ 84] C. Action To Determine or Enforce Right to Office[49]—1. By Minister. The right of one claiming to use the church property in administering the ceremonies and rites in his priestly capacity may be tested in an action to restrain another alleged to be wrongfully depriving him of the minister's office.[50] But equity will interfere to protect a minister in the enjoyment of his office only when his contract and relations with the church are such as to confer on him a property right in the office,[51] such as exemption from taxation[52] and the right to perform certain civil acts.[53] His right to the salary and emoluments are not vested property rights, which the civil court will protect against the acts of an ecclesiastical body having authority under the rules and discipline of the church to so act.[54] Where the suit for an injunction is brought against an officer or body within the church to prevent a threatened removal, the suit can be maintained only on the narrow jurisdictional ground that the superior officer or body assuming to deprive him of his office has no power under the laws of the church to do so.[55] And the court's power to act is still further confined to cases where the minister has seasonably objected to the jurisdiction,[56] a failure to object to the power of the ecclesiastical officer or body to act before it proceeds to do so constituting a waiver of his right to object later on this ground.[57] Within the limitations stated,[58] an injunction will lie to prevent an unwarranted removal of a minister by a bishop,[59] or by trustees,[60] or to enjoin the trustees of a church from refusing to receive the regularly appointed minister and from denying him the use of the church edifice,[61] or to restrain the governing body from hindering a minister wrongfully removed, in the exercise of his office,[62] or, where a minister and his followers adhere to the faith and doctrine which the church corporation was formed to establish and maintain, to enjoin other members of the church who have rejected its teachings and ceremonials from interfering with plaintiffs in their use of the church property.[63] Nor is a minister wrongfully excluded from the church edifice under any necessity of applying to the ecclesiastical courts before resorting to the civil courts for relief.[64] Where the action is against trustees, the Church Corporation should be made a party.[65]

[§ 85] 2. Against Minister. While an action by the attorney-general in the nature of quo warranto is the proper remedy against officers of a church corporation to test their right to their offices,[66] where a minister is not an officer of the corporation,[67] his right to his office may be contested by a bill in equity brought against him to enjoin his alleged usurpation of the office.[68] To justify a court of equity in interfering with the occupancy of a pulpit, a clear case should be made out;[69] but this having been done it has been held that an injunction will issue to prevent the election of a minister who has not been regularly licensed,[70] to prevent a person not duly selected as minister from officiating in the church,[71] and to enjoin a deposed minister,[72] or a minister whose contract of employment has expired from continuing to officiate in a particular church and to use the church property;[73] but not to eject a clergyman, once regularly settled, merely because the vestry desire to turn him out,[74] nor to enjoin a minister from preaching or interfering with governmental affairs of the church where the officer or body assuming to discharge him had no authority,[75] or had not complied with recognized church usages in doing so.[76]

[§ 86] D. Authority, Rights, and Privileges[77]—1. In General. Ordinarily the minister is not an officer of the church having authority to bind it by his acts,[78] and, if granted a special authority, he has no power to bind the church by acts outside the authority granted.[79] Nor has a minister, requiring authority from the bishop in order to contract debts for the church and given authority by the bishop for that purpose, any authority thereby to bind the bishop,[80] or, in the absence of any element of estoppel,[81] to bind the church after the special authority has been exhausted.[82] But an incorporated church will be bound on the ground of estoppel if with knowledge of the minister's unauthorized acts the trustees accepted and used for church purposes the benefits resulting therefrom.[83] However, a minister's official acts, when not contrary to statute, and when called in question incidentally, are as valid as the official acts of other persons,[84] but he cannot set up the official character of his acts to justify a trespass.[85] A priest's tortious or criminal acts done outside the scope of his authority place no liability therefor on the bishop who appointed him even though chargeable with negligence in the appointment of one whom he knew to be unfit for the place,[86] especially where the bishop's negligence was not the proximate cause of the injury which followed.[87] A minister can delegate to another no more authority than he possesses.[88]

[§ 87] 2. Use of Church Property.[89] A minister has the right to enter the church edifice for the purpose of conducting religious services,[90] regardless of whether the church is incorporated or holds title to the building,[91] and is entitled to the custody of the church keys.[92] He is also entitled to occupy the rectory or parsonage under the terms of his contract during the period of his incumbency.[93]

[§ 88] 3. Compensation and Reimbursements[94]—a. In General. The right to the salary stipulated at the time a minister accepts the call and is installed is a valuable property right secured to him by contract,[95] subject to denominational rules and usages[96] and to statutes applicable thereto which are expressly or by implication a part of the contract,[97] the terms of which cannot be ignored or violated with impunity by the church or society employing him,[98] unless the minister secured the contract by representations as to his faith and standing which were not true.[99] The minister's right to recover in such cases is governed by the law of contracts,[1] a recovery being allowed only when the minister has performed all the duties which the church or society allowed him to perform,[2] or has at all times exhibited readiness and ability to perform,[3] or when the society by requesting his resignation has been held to have thereby waived its right to set up his acts and omissions as ground for forfeiture of his right to compensation;[4] and a recovery not being allowed against the trustees individually when the contract was made by them as agents in behalf of the church and solely upon its credit.[5] While it has been held that to support an action against an incorporated society to recover his salary, it is only necessary for the minister to show a call by the church and his acceptance, and acquiescence by the trustees,[6] the stipulated salary is not recoverable when it is shown that the minister entered into the contract with knowledge that the officers with whom he was contracting were not legally elected,[7] or where the officers exceeded the power conferred upon them by statute in making the contract.[8] Where the minister, at the time of entering into the contract, knows that his salary is to be paid from voluntary contributions, he cannot recover an amount in excess of the contributions actually received,[9] provided the society uses due diligence in procuring and collecting subscriptions.[10] And where he contracts for his services on the credit of the society and not of a particular fund, he impliedly agrees to look solely to the society for his compensation.[11] Independently of his contractual rights, however, a minister is entitled to participate in the distribution of a fund if he is within the class intended to be benefited thereby.[12] A provision of the church discipline that a claim for deficiency may be presented to the conference does not prevent the minister recovering whatever salary the congregation has contracted to pay him,[13] but where he has contracted with two societies, each undertaking to pay him a stated part of his salary, he can only recover from each the amount which it obligated itself to pay.[14]

to support a priest who has not been assigned to a congregation or employed in any other ecclesiastical work, warranting a recovery in assumpsit against the bishop in the civil courts,[26] nor will an assignment of the priest to duty justify any right to recover on an alleged implied contract against the bishop in the absence of allegation and proof of the civil rights and powers of the Roman catholic church and its bishop to hold property and make contracts.[27] A minister is entitled to reimbursement for money advanced which the society has accepted and used for church purposes.[28]

[§ 90] 4. Exemptions.[29] Under the statutes of some states, ministers are exempt from taxation,[30] but not from patrol duty required by a city ordinance.[31]

In England, clergymen are exempt from arrest while in a chapel,[32] or while attending a visitation.[33] They are also exempt from the payment of toll on a turnpike road when attending to their parochial duties.[34] They are liable, however, in like manner as other persons, to be adjudged bankrupts.[35]

[§ 91] E. Tenure and Termination of Relation—1. In General. The pastoral relation between a minister and his church may be terminated by expiration of his term, by resignation, or by discharge.[36] A minister employed by a church for a definite term is no longer its minister after the term has expired, where the appointing body in the church at a meeting duly called has voted to discontinue his employment at the end of the term, and has so notified him.[37] A resignation on terms and conditions named by the minister becomes effective according to its terms when accepted and the conditions performed;[38] and when that has been done, the minister's rights to his office are thereby terminated notwithstanding a later attempt to repudiate his offer to resign,[39] but notwithstanding his leaving the church his pastorate continues until it is formally terminated by the trustees or the congregation.[40] Unless the rules and discipline of the church otherwise provide,[41] a church which has employed a pastor for a definite period has the power to discharge him before the expiration of that time, so as to deprive him of the right to occupy the pulpit,[42] and without first paying him his arrears of salary,[43] although it may be liable for his salary in case the dismissal was without cause.[44] Where the appointment is not for a definite term and neither statute nor charter prescribe its duration, he may be dismissed at any time[45] upon reasonable notice,[46] and payment in full of salary due him is not a condition precedent to the exercise of the power to remove,[47] although the church may ultimately be held liable therefor.[48] An election "permanently" to a rectorship, and a call and acceptance in those terms, is held to be an appointment for an indefinite term,[49] but a contract providing for a continuance in office "till otherwise provided of some ecclesiastical preferment,"[50] or, in the early history of New England a "settlement" of a minister over a parish,[51] are construed to give a tenure terminable only by death, or for cause, or upon the contingency named in the contract. A "settlement" may be modified by terms of the contract to provide for dismissal by following a prescribed procedure, but a dismissal in any other way is ineffectual and the incumbent continues as the "settled minister" of the parish.[52] A minister may be summarily dismissed where under the church government the congregation[53] or a bishop has that power,[54] the compact or charter for the support of public worship according to the faith, doctrine and usages of a particular church being construed as an express recognition of the parties of the right of the proper officials to appoint and remove its pastor in the manner prescribed by its laws;[55] but he cannot be so dismissed where the constitution, rules, and usages of the church enter into and form a part of the contract, and these do not provide for a summary dismissal.[56] Nor has the congregation an absolute power to dismiss where the rules and discipline of the church provide that the pastoral relation can be severed only upon application to the bishop.[57]

Bond to resign. In England, if a person having power to appoint requires the prospective appointee to give him at the time of his appointment a bond in general terms to resign, the bond is unlawful,[58] and, although the point of unlawfulness of the giving of the bond was a controverted one before finally settled in the house of lords,[59] it had always been beyond dispute that if the patron made an ill-use of the bond, the court would award a perpetual injunction against it.[60]

[§ 92] 2. Church Officers and Bodies Having Authority To Remove. The persons vested with the power of appointment possess the power of removal,[61] except where the power is conferred on others by the charter of the corporation;[62] and it has been held that a board of trustees has power to dismiss a priest by virtue of a by-law which placed in its hands the control and direction of the association and church.[63]

[§ 93] 3. Grounds for Removal. A minister removable only for cause may be dismissed for neglect of duty,[64] for discontinuance of his membership in the synod[65] or of his adherence to the faith and doctrine of the church,[66] unless under the rules and discipline of the church the right to secede is an established principle and the minister in his change of faith is supported by a majority of his congregation,[67] and for immoral or criminal conduct.[68] But immoralities must be gross to justify dismissal[69] and the court will not consider charges of immorality where both parties to the contract are satisfied and neither desires to dissolve the relation.[70] Dismissal is not justified by false statements by the minister not constituting dishonesty or immoral conduct,[71] nor by improper words, actions or temper containing no element of an indictable offense,[72] nor by actions of the church alleged to be in contravention of the church faith and discipline in the absence of similar charges against the minister individually,[73] a charge that the minister was moderator of the meeting at which the action of the church was taken not being the equivalent of a charge of heterodoxy against him.[74]

[§ 94] 4. Removal Proceedings. Where there is an ecclesiastical judiciary vested with power to consider alleged grounds of forfeiture of the pastoral office, and to make findings thereon, it is the proper forum for hearing and determining the matter,[75] and a parish or congregation which fails to appeal to a council or other ecclesiastical court having jurisdiction waives its right to a review of its pastor's alleged errors in the civil court.[76] If there is no judiciary of this nature, or if it should refuse to act, the court intimates that an inquiry might be made in a court of law.[77] And where the canon of the church so provides, the bishop's power to deprive a minister of his license is so far curtailed that he has no power to act on charges of immorality without a trial by the diocesan court.[78] Where the relation of a minister to his church is created by a contract between the minister and the church solely, and there is no express term in the contract subordinating the church to a superior body in the appointment and removal of its minister, the relation of the minister to the church cannot be dissolved against the will of the contracting parties by such a body,[79] nor will the court dissolve the pastoral relation at the instance of such a body,[80] but in such case when either party to the contract desires a dissolution of the pastoral relation and the parties are unable to agree, and the rules and discipline of the church provide for such a procedure, they may call to their assistance a mutual council, so called to indicate that on that point at least there is agreement;[81] or the aggrieved party may request the assistance of an ex parte council, if from failure to agree a mutual council becomes impossible,[82] but only after the other party has been given opportunity[83] and refused[84] to join in the request. An application to a minister to join with his society in calling a council to consider the expediency of removing him for misconduct should state substantially the charges against him,[85] and, where the council recommends a dissolution of the contract, the recommendation should specify which of the charges were proved.[86] Partiality on the part of members of the council, when proven, invalidates the findings, making them ineffectual as justification for removal.[87] In the case of a mutual council, the presumption favors the existence of impartiality.[88] But the proof of impartiality must be clear where the council is ex parte.[89] The decision of the church tribunal is binding on both parties where their contract so provides,[90] or where the rules of the denomination, authorizing the deposition of pastors by ecclesiastical tribunals, form part of the contract,[91] but in the absence of evidence of intention of the parties to clothe the council with power to make a binding award, the decision of the council is merely advisory and does not bind a party who rejects it,[92] the pastoral relation continuing to exist as before, both parties having the same duties to perform and the same obligations as if no council had been convoked,[93] its only effect being to operate as a justification of the party adopting it and conforming to it.[94] Where the parties by their contract have subjected themselves to the decisions of church judicatories under the rules and discipline of the church providing for appeal from the decision of a lower judicatory to a higher, the decision of the highest judicatory is binding on the parties, until the aggrieved party by new proceedings on other charges again raises the issue of dismissal.[95]

[§ 95] F. Rights of Minister after Removal[96]—1. Compensation. A minister dismissed without cause in breach of his contract for a definite period may recover his unpaid salary for the full period.[97] If his tenure was at the will of the body dismissing him, he may still recover arrears of salary up to the time of his dismissal.[98] A minister settled over his parish under a contract of settlement who is rightfully dismissed before the beginning of a new year of service cannot recover for the refusal of the society to permit him to act during that year,[99] nor can he compel the holding of the "annual donation party" for that year provided for in his contract of settlement.[1] On the other hand, a minister cannot be enjoined from receiving such contributions as persons choose to give him merely because he has been rightfully deposed from the ministry by some ecclesiastical judicatory,[2] and if his removal by the bishop has been against the rules and discipline of the church, his right to receive voluntary offerings to the church for the support of its minister is a property right which the court will protect by enjoining the unlawful removal.[3] Where a church notifies its minister that his services will be no longer required, but accepts such services which he continues to perform it must pay for such services at the contract rate.[4] Where the pastoral relation is suspended pending a final determination by a higher judicatory of questions as to the regularity of his removal, he is entitled to his compensation during the period of suspension if he holds himself in readiness to perform his ministerial duties,[5] but if he seeks and secures other employment during such period and never offers to resume the pastoral relation, he cannot recover compensation for this period.[6]

[§ 96] 2. Use of Church Property.[7] A minister who has been dismissed is no longer entitled to use or occupy any property belonging to the church,[8] nor have the trustees of a Roman Catholic church authority to permit an excommunicated priest to officiate therein.[9] But a rector dismissed by the vestry without the authority from the superior ecclesiastical body which the discipline of the church required it to have, cannot be prevented from conducting religious services in the church and any attempt to do so may be restrained by injunction.[10] The refusal of a minister to leave the parsonage on his suspension from ministerial service and church privileges, subject to the action of the next annual conference, will not render him a trespasser so as to justify the trustees of the local church in evicting him therefrom by violence without the aid of legal process,[11] although a refusal of a minister to leave after he has been rightfully dismissed does subject him to liability for rent, even though during his incumbency he was entitled to occupancy rent-free.[12]

Reinstatement.[13] A minister who has actual notice of the time and place of his trial on charges affecting his right to continue in the ministry cannot compel his reinstatement on the ground of irregularities in the notice,[14] or on the ground of incidental irregularities of the trial.[15] A deposed minister is not estopped by his voluntary withdrawal from the church division of which his congregation was a member from having his dismissal declared unlawful;[16] but he is so estopped where he has already sued for his salary.[17]

VIII. PROPERTY AND FUNDS

[§ 98] A. Acquisition and Forfeiture—1. By Unincorporated Society. In the absence of any statute empowering it to do so,[18] mere voluntary religious associations, like unincorporated associations generally,[19] are incapable of taking and holding real[20] or personal property in their society name,[21] although a gift to an unincorporated religious society has been upheld as a gift to pious[22] or charitable uses.[23] A conveyance may be made for the use and benefit of an unincorporated religious society through the intervention of a trustee,[24] who may be a natural or artificial person,[25] notwithstanding the fact that the trustee has not filed his certificate of election as required by statute.[26] Such a gift cannot be upheld as being made to a corporation de facto in the absence of evidence that it was such in fact,[27] especially where there is evidence that no attempt at incorporation was made until later.[28] In some states, unincorporated religious societies have the status of quasi corporations under the statute, being granted limited powers to take and hold real estate in the name of the society.[29]

[§ 99] 2. By Incorporated Society.[30] An incorporated religious society has capacity to take and hold property, both real and personal, in its own name for its own uses, whether de jure[31] or de facto,[32] and without regard to its faith or church connections or the absence of them,[33] provided only the rules of the corporation under which the property was acquired are not void as against public policy,[34]

[a] In Massachusetts under the statutes providing that unincorporated religious societies shall have like power as incorporated societies to manage, use, and employ, according to its terms and conditions, any gift or grant made to them, a voluntary religious society possesses, for the purpose of taking, holding, and transmitting property, all the qualifying attributes of a duly organized corporation. [b] In Pennsylvania (1) the statute confirms in unequivocal terms to every religious society incorporated or unincorporated, the absolute ownership of its property subject only to the condition that it shall not divert it from the uses and trusts to which it may have been lawfully dedicated. Krauczunas v. Hoban, 221 Pa. 213, 70 A 740; Brown v. Lutheran Church, 23 Pa. 495; Magill v. Brown, 16 F. Cas. No. 8,952, Brightly 346. (3) But an unincorporated camp meeting association is not a religious denomination or society within the statutes authorizing such societies to lease lands. O'Neill v. [a] Property rules of monastic brotherhood.—The agreement in the

the power being conferred upon the incorporated body,[35] whether it be the religious society itself or its trustees or other officers.[36] A religious society, after it has become incorporated, may compel the specific performance of a contract to deliver land which had been made with the trustees of the society before it was incorporated.[37] But a devise to an unincorporated society which in order to allow time for incorporating, postpones the vesting to a time not measured by lives in being, is void.[38] Except insofar as it may be restricted by statute,[39] a religious corporation itself has power to hold property as a trustee, for any of the purposes for which the society was incorporated,[40] or in trust for another unincorporated religious society,[41] or for a charity.[42]

[§ 100] 3. By Church or Society Recognized or Organized under Spanish Laws and Treaties. The recognition by treaty of the right of a church to hold property is another source from which a religious society may derive power to acquire and hold real estate,[43] as in the case of the Roman Catholic Church in Spanish possessions afterwards ceded to the United States, its right to hold property being recognized by the concordats between Spain and the papacy, and such rights being protected in the law by which these possessions were ceded to the United States.[44] The fact that such property was acquired from gifts, even of public funds, does not affect the absoluteness of its right.[45] Also the Cofradia organized to care for the church building,[46] and the Confraternities of the Virgin, organized to carry on with greater solemnity and pomp the adoration of the Virgin Mother of the Savior,[47] which are unincorporated associations of the Roman Catholic faith organized under the old Spanish laws, are held to have legal existence and the right to possess and administer property, each Cofradia or Confraternity being a juridical entity having title to the property which it possesses.

[§ 101] 4. Constitutional and Statutory Limitations and Restrictions[48]—a. On Purpose for Which Acquired or Held. A religious corporation cannot acquire or hold property for any purpose other than that of promoting the object of its creation.[49] For example, it cannot buy to sell again on speculation.[50] But it can accept a gift for authorized corporate purposes on condition of payment of an annuity to the donor, even though it had no power under its charter to deal in annuities.[51] It may take property in trust for any one of its authorized purposes, a declaration of trust co-extensive with the uses for which the society can hold property not being essential.[52] Statutes in some states in express terms limit the purposes for which real property may be acquired or held by a religious corporation,[53] but words of limitation are to be given their natural meaning in determining the extent of power granted.[54] Where the statute contains no other restriction, a religious corporation may acquire or hold property for purposes designated by the statute in any quantity or value,[55] and where the legislature later removes the limitation, it may sell free of the restriction.[56] A constitution restricting the power of religious corporations to hold real estate to certain enumerated purposes,[57] inferentially prohibits their acquiring or holding of land for a purpose not named.[58] Where a constitution prohibits conveyances to religious societies without the sanction of the legislature except for certain purposes,[59] a conveyance, not sanctioned by the legislature and not showing it was for any of the purposes named in the exception, is void.[60]

[§ 102] b. On Amount Acquired or Held. Statutes limiting the amount of property which a religious society may hold[61] are constitutional.[62] A deed of land to a society which brings its holdings to a point in excess of the statutory limit is absolutely void or voidable at the instance of the state, depending on the interest of the parties in the land conveyed.[63] An amendment increasing the limit, enlarges to that extent the power of the corporation.[64] The statute by its terms may restrict the limitation to a particular class of religious societies,[65] in which case a religious society not within the terms of the statute is not affected by the limitation;[66] or a constitution may provide for the holding of title to land by religious corporations in excess of the constitutional limit by leave of the legislature,[67] in which case no restriction is placed on the legislature and in its discretion it may grant leave to a religious corporation to take land in any amount.[68] Such limitations and restrictions apply to a single religious society,[69] and a society's capacity to acquire and hold real estate is not affected by the fact that other societies in the same denomination are holding land far in excess of the amount allowed.[70] They apply to land acquired or held by a society for its own use,[71] not to land held by it in trust for charitable uses,[72] nor to land directed to be sold and the proceeds given to the society,[73] especially where the society is located in a state other than the state where the limitation is in force.[74] But they do apply as against the cestui que trust to lands held by a trustee in trust for a religious society which is subject to the statutory limitation,[75] nor will the fact that the trustee has by a sale converted the realty into personalty validate the trust, or render it enforceable in equity,[76] unless by the terms of the will the property is given in this way to the cestui que trust for charitable uses.[77] Where the statute in terms applies to equitable as well as legal estates in land,[78] it is held to invalidate the gift of an equitable estate for years in land exceeding the statutory limit, although an estate for years is for some purposes regarded as personal estate.[79] A charter provision limiting the real estate holdings of a religious corporation does not, however, operate to restrict its power to accept personal estate,[80] and in the absence of restriction, a corporation may, in such case, take for legitimate corporate uses personalty without limitation.[81] Under an act of Congress limiting the real estate holdings of religious or charitable corporations in the territories,[82] the title of land held by a religious corporation in excess of the statutory amount escheats to the United States,[83] and the fact that it holds land greatly in excess of the limited amount is ground for the appointment of a receiver.[84] Where a religious corporation, subject to the restriction, is holding land in excess of the statutory allowance, its violation of the law cannot be taken advantage of collaterally by private persons, but only in a direct proceeding by the state,[85] unless the party complaining is in a position to claim an interest in the property, if it is adjudged that the corporation may not hold it.[86] Nor in the absence of a statutory provision declaring a forfeiture to the state of property held by a religious corporation in excess of the statutory limit, can the state do more than force a sale by the society. It cannot take the land from the society.[87]

[§ 103] c. On Time Allowed for Holding. Where a statute permits a religious corporation to hold land for a fixed period of years after its acquisition,[88] time does not commence to run in the case of a devise of a remainder until the expiration of the life estate.[89]

[§ 104] d. On Societies Which May Acquire or Hold. A statute declaring that no conveyance, devise or lease of real estate for purposes of religious worship shall vest any right, title or interest in the grantee unless made to a corporation organized under a particularly designated statute,[90] is held to apply to all conveyances, devises or leases made after enactment of the restrictive act transferring property dedicated to purposes of religious worship either before or after such act,[91] but title to land conveyed to a corporation organized under the particularly designated statute vests in the trustees when that statute so provides.[92] A constitutional prohibition against incorporation of a certain class of religious societies[93] does not operate to prevent a religious corporation not within that class from holding property.[94]

[§ 105] 5. Mode of Acquisition—a. In General. Religious societies legally competent to acquire and hold property[95] may, within limitations imposed by constitution and statute,[96] acquire property by adverse possession,[97] by devise or bequest,[98] by various forms of public aid subject to constitutional restrictions existing in some states,[99] by deeds, donations, and grants,[1] by agreements, express or implied, between societies by which the property rights of each are vested in an association or in a superior church judicatory,[2] by agreements under which the property of individual members of a religious society is surrendered to the society,[3] which agreements have been held not to be against public policy where they include a provision reserving to the member the privilege of voluntary withdrawal at any time.[4] A statute authorizing a parish to convert its ministerial lands with the consent of the minister of the parish for the time being does not operate to divest a town of its title to lands formerly used for church purposes and to vest title to such lands in the parish.[5]

[§ 106] b. By Adverse Possession. It is very generally held that a religious corporation may obtain a title to land by adverse possession,[6] and the corporate acts without vote or deed are sufficient proof of the adverse entry and occupation.[7] Although the religious corporation has already acquired real estate to the statutory limit and is legally incapable of acquiring more, it cannot, after holding additional land for the period necessary to establish title by adverse possession, be ousted by the real owner,[8] and

[8] Humbert v. Trinity Church, 24 Wend. (N. Y.) 587, 604.

"Nor can it be received as an objection, that the possession and claim of title are by the agents or tenants of a corporation incapable by law of taking lands. It is said that the law will not do an idle thing; that by its own operation, it will not cast a title upon one not competent to take as a purchaser, any more than it will carry land by descent to an alien. The answer was properly given at the bar, that the argument confounds the acquisition of title with the cutting off a remedy. The plaintiff is barred of his action because he has been shut out of possession by an adverse claimant for 20 years. . . . The remedy is therefore gone. Admit that the law will cast no title on the corporation, the answer [of the corporation], in the words of the statute, is equally fatal: 'You have been out of possession for more than twenty years, and are thus disqualified to maintain an action to recover your land against me or any other.'" Humbert v. Trinity Church, supra.

although a conveyance to a religious corporation is void because in contravention of the constitution, the entry into possession by the corporation after the conveyance, and continuance of such possession for the statutory period, perfects the title against all persons not under legal disabilities.[9] As a general rule an unincorporated religious society cannot acquire title by adverse possession,[10] except in jurisdictions where for limited purposes an unincorporated religious society is allowed to take and hold real estate in its own name.[11] But its officers can for its benefit;[12] and if a corporation is afterward organized, the prior possession may be tacked to its own, to establish its title under the statute of limitations.[13]

[§ 107] c. By Devise or Bequest.[14] A religious corporation may accept bequests for uses within the scope of its charter or the law under which it was incorporated,[15] to an amount not exceeding that limited by statute,[16] unless the statute expressly prohibits it,[17] but it cannot take land by devise, unless and only to the extent that it is expressly authorized to do so by its charter or by statute,[18] although there are some early cases to the contrary.[19] In some states enabling statutes exist, while in others religious corporations are expressly forbidden to take by devise.[20] Authority to take by devise is not granted by a statute authorizing a religious corporation to acquire property by "conveyance,"[21] or by "deed,"[22] although it has been held to be conferred by a statute authorizing a transfer of property to a religious corporation by "deed or conveyance;"[23] nor is a power to take by will conferred by a granted power to receive "subscriptions or contributions in money or otherwise."[24] Whether a religious corporation can take property by devise in a particular case will depend upon the terms of the statute granting the power and the nature of the use for which the property is devised,[25] and where the terms of the charter of the corporation or of the statute under which it was incorporated conflict with the terms of a later general law in this respect, the terms of the charter or earlier incorporating statute control.[26] Under a constitutional provision permitting devises for limited purposes to a "religious sect, order or denomination,"[27] a local congregation uncontrolled by any general ecclesiastical organization is capable of receiving a devise.[28] A distinction is made between the statutes of mortmain proper which are against the holding of land at all by corporations, and statutes prohibiting devises of land for charitable uses. A statute granting power to a religious corporation to take land by devise exempts the corporation from the operation of the statute of mortmain, giving it the power to take by devise that an individual would have. But a grant of power to take by devise is not, per se, a grant of power to accept a devise of land for charitable uses. The grant must be in specific terms to give it that effect.[29] Also where the grant of the power to take by devise is restricted to devises for particular purposes, the corporation has no power to take by devise for a purpose not enumerated,[30] and a corporation having authority to take by devise only for its own use cannot take under the statute for any other use,[31] although it has been held that where a religious corporation is prohibited from taking real estate by devise, the prohibition does not invalidate a testamentary trust for purposes personal to the testator, merely because the church was named as trustee in the will.[32] Especially where a taking by devise for the excluded purposes is expressly prohibited, the power to take by devise is strictly confined to the purposes included in the statute.[33] In jurisdictions where the English statute of charitable uses (43 Elizabeth) is not in force as a part of the common law,[34] the power of the religious corporation to accept devises of property or trust is restricted to purposes declared as lawful by the local statute,[35] and on the terms laid down by the local law,[36]

[a] Devise to maintain a particular faith.—Under the early New York rule giving trustees of incorporated religious societies power to manage temporalities free from denominational control (see supra § 22), a devise to maintain a particular faith in perpetuity, being void, trustees are held to take a devise in trust for all members of the society, and not merely for church

Where the statute expressly provides that no religious corporation, body or society shall take under a will,[37] both devises and bequests to a religious society are void,[38] and whether the testamentary gift is a devise of real estate or a bequest of the proceeds of real estate is immaterial, both being by will and so prohibited by the law.[39] But where the prohibition extends to devises of real estate only,[40] bequests of personal estate are valid,[41] and inasmuch as a prohibition of devises to religious corporations does not invalidate a devise to such corporation in trust for purposes personal to the testator,[42] a religious corporation prohibited from taking a devise of real estate may take by will an estate including both real and personal estate, where the real estate can be applied under the terms of the will to other than church purposes, and the personal estate appropriated for the church.[43]

Foreign corporations. In the absence of statute in the state of testator's domicile forbidding bequests to foreign religious organizations, such foreign organization may take devises and legacies under the will of a resident of another state, whenever, by the laws under which they are incorporated, such corporations have authority to acquire property by will, unless such devises or legacies are repugnant to the laws of such other state.[44] But a religious society incorporated by another state can by comity have no better title to take property by devise than domestic corporations in that state.[45]

[§ 108] d. By Public Aid—(1) Constitutional Prohibitions. Under some state constitutions, states, counties and towns are prohibited from making any gift of money or land to any church, or for any sectarian purpose.[46] These provisions do not prohibit the granting of a permit by a county to a religious denomination to build a chapel on county land for use by the county poor in religious worship, where the title to the chapel remains in the county.[47] Nor are payments by government to religious schools to reimburse them for increased costs due to services rendered by such schools to soldiers and sailors in the World War gifts to religious societies within the meaning of the constitutional prohibition.[48] Nor is excusing pupils from attendance on public schools to attend religious instruction outside of school, a use of public property, credit or money in aid of religious denominations within the meaning of a constitutional prohibition of such use.[49] Nor is the reading of the Bible without comment in the public schools an expenditure of public money for "sectarian purpose" within the meaning of the constitutional prohibition.[50]

[§ 109] (2) Share in Ministerial Fund.[51] Constitutional or statutory provisions in some states secure to every denomination of religious societies, in each township, an equal participation, according to their number of adherents, of the profits arising from the land granted by congress for the support of religion.[52] This fund is for the support of religion in the township in which the land furnishing the fund is located,[53] and cannot be appropriated for any other purpose,[54] or for the support of religion in any other place.[55] A society must be organized for religious, not secular, purposes to be entitled to share in the distribution,[56] and it must qualify by proof to the selectmen or town trustees that it is a religious society of some denomination, that it is organized, has a name, a duly appointed agent, and has furnished a list of members.[57] The number of its members determines its proportionate share in the fund.[58] To be entitled to a place on the list, a member of the society must be a citizen of the township,[59] citizen being synonymous with resident,[60] and over fifteen years of age,[61] but the faith and doctrine of the society is immaterial,[62] provided it belongs to some sect or denomination.[63] The selectmen or town trustees determine whether or not the society claiming a share of the fund has qualified,[64] and, if so, the number of its members entitled to be counted,[65] the list furnished by the claimant not being conclusive on this issue,[66] but they cannot sit in judgment on the faith of its members,[67] except to determine that they are members of a society belonging to some sect or denomination.[68] Their function is a judicial one, and they cannot be held liable for error in admitting or excluding evidence on which to form their judgment, provided they act in good faith and with reasonable diligence.[69] Nor can a claim, erroneously rejected, be charged upon the fund of a subsequent year.[70] Where it appears that the trustees had requested proof of a society to substantiate its claim, but no sufficient proof has been brought forward, mandamus will not lie to compel action by the trustees on the claim.[71] The right of religious societies in a town to share in funds previously established for their benefit is not abridged or in any way affected by the repeal of a law authorizing towns to vote and grant money for the settlement, maintenance and support of the ministry.[72]

[§ 110] 6. Right, Title, or Interest Acquired—a. Necessity of Transfer. A religious corporation does not acquire title to property merely by force of the statutory provision which gives it power to take and hold real estate which has been given, granted or devised to it. There must still be a deed or will evidencing an intent of the former owner to pass title to the corporation.[73] And so the incorporation of a second corporation to take over church property held by the original corporation does not work a succession to the property without transfer.[74] But a confirmation of the appointment of original trustees, who hold title, and providing a new mode of appointment for the future, does not require a transfer to the trustees as trustees under the order of confirmation.[75] Under a statute granting power to a religious corporation to establish missions and associate churches which in their turn may become incorporated with the consent of the parent church,[76] title to the property occupied by the incorporated mission does not pass to the mission by virtue of the parent's consent to the incorporation, in the absence of evidence of consent to the passing of title.[77] A fortiori, in the absence of evidence of consent of the parent church not only to the passing of title, but to the incorporation of the mission church, no title passes to the latter.[78] However title to personal property held in trust by the parent church for the mission church does pass to the latter upon its incorporation,[79] even though the incorporation was without the consent of the parent church.[80]

[§ 111] b. Construction and Operation of Deeds, Donations, and Grants[81]—(1) In General. An intention of the parties to a transaction, disclosed by their acts, that title shall pass is an essential to a voluntary transfer of property to[82] or from a religious society.[83] In whom the title vests upon transfer by deed, donation or grant, is governed by rules of the common law in the absence of constitutional or statutory provisions.[84] A grant to a town for use of the ministry vests the legal title in the town.[85]

[a] Deeds, donations, and grants to towns and parishes.—(1) In Massachusetts and others of the New England states it was formerly held that lands granted to a town for the use of the ministry vested in the town in its parochial capacity. Richardson v. Brown, 6 Me. 355; New Market v. Smart, 45 N. H. 87. (2) And land given to a town for the use of the ministry might, with the leave of the legislature and consent of all parties interested, be appropriated to the support of several ministers settled over distinct portions of the inhabitants of the town (Lanesborough Cong. Soc. v. Curtis, 22 Pick. (Mass.) 320; Humphrey v. Whitney, 3 Pick. (Mass.) 158), (3) and upon the erection or incorporation of the first parish in the town, the lands vested in the parish, which succeeded to the parochial rights and duties before belonging to the town (Sedgwick v. Pierce, 2 Root (Conn.) 431; Wells v. Heath, 10 Gray (Mass.) 17; Medford First Parish v. Medford, 21 Pick. (Mass.) 199; Shrewsbury First Parish v. Smith, 14 Pick. (Mass.) 297; Milton v. Milton First Cong. Parish, 10 Pick. (Mass.) 447; New Market v. Smart, 45 N. H. 87). (4) Where lands were held by the town in its parochial capacity, the proceeds of the sale of such lands were also held by the town in like capacity; and upon the separate organization of a parish, the parish succeeded to all the parochial property of the town (Winthrop v. Winthrop, 1 Me. 208; Tobey v. Wareham Bank, 13 Metc. (Mass.) 440; Ludlow v. Sikes, 19 Pick. (Mass.) 317), (5) and a poll parish was held to be within the rule (Sutton First Parish v. Cole, 8 Mass. 96). (6) The first parish, which was the successor of a town in its parochial capacity, might maintain trespass against a stranger for plowing up land used for purposes incidental to the place of worship, such land having been appropriated for the purpose by the town. Shrewsbury First Parish v. Smith, 14 Pick. (Mass.) 297. (7) Real estate originally granted to a parish, upon the subsequent incorporation of the parish into a town, passed to and was held by the new corporation (Lakin v. Ames, 10 Cush. (Mass.) 198), (8) unless prior to such incorporation a new religious society was formed therein, recognized by statute as an independent organization and its members therefore exempted from taxation in the original parish (Essex v. Low, 5 Allen (Mass.) 595). (9) If the town was subsequently divided into parishes, such property reverted to the original parish unless in the meantime it had been exclusively appropriated to the use of the town in its municipal capacity, but property held by the town in its municipal capacity remained still that of the town after the separation of the parish (Lakin v. Ames, 10 Cush. (Mass.) 198), (10) and after a grant of land to a town for the use of the ministry, if the town was divided, and such land fell within the boundaries of the new town, the title to the land still remained in the old town (Union Baptist Soc. v. Candia, 2 N. H. 20). (11) Lands thus given and appropriated were held by the minister of the parish as an estate in fee simple in him and his successors (Bucksport v. Spofford, 12 Me. 487; Brown v. Porter, 10 Mass. 93; Brunswick First Parish v. Dunning, 7 Mass. 445; Weston v. Hunt, 2 Mass. 500), (12) the first appointed minister and his successors taking the same, upon a regular settlement and ordination (Bucksport v. Spofford, 12 Me. 487; Brown v. Porter, 10 Mass. 93; Williams v. North Hero, 46 Vt. 301; Dow v. Hinesburgh, 2 Aik. (Vt.) 18; Sheldon v. Goodsel, 1 Aik. (Vt.) 225. See also Bisbee v. Evans, 4 Me. 374; Williams v. North Hero, 46 Vt. 301), (13) as a sole corporation (Bucksport v. Spofford, 12 Me. 487; Emer-

If the grant is to the church and the church unincorporated, title is held at common law to vest in the minister as representing the church,[86] the minister being seized only in right of the church, with no power of alienation beyond the time of his ministry, and on his resignation, death or deprivation, the freehold being in abeyance until his successor is inducted into office;[87] nor has a minister, seized in right of the church, power to alienate without the authority duly granted to him by a majority of the members of the church.[88] Under the statutes,[89] title has been held to vest by transfer in the minister[90] or bishop of a church as corporation sole;[91] in an organized religious society, although not incorporated;[92] and in an incorporated religious body, de jure or de facto.[93]

[§ 112] (2) Conveyance to Trustees of Religious Society. A deed to the trustees of a religious society and their successors, for the use of the society, vests the legal title in the trustees,[94] and whether the trustees are a corporation or not is immaterial so long as they are a legal body capable of taking estates by grant.[95] But a deed to individuals described as trustees of a religious society, and their successors without stating that the grant is to the use of the society, vests an absolute title in the individuals named not subject to a trust for the society.[96] A deed granting the legal title to trustees named and the superintendence, custody and control to the trustees of the congregation which includes the trustees named in the deed and others, does not vest title in the trustees of the congregation or give them the right to sell the property.[97] Where the conveyance to trustees and their successors states that the grant is for the use of the society, and the society is incorporated, in some states the statute executes the trust and vests the legal title in the society,[98] and the title conveyed is a fee simple notwithstanding the omission of the word "heirs" in the habendum clause.[99] But a deed conveying real estate to certain named individuals, not as trustees of any incorporated religious society, nor to their successors in office, does not pass the title to parties who claim to be such successors.[1] Under some statutes where the legal corporation consists of the trustees and does not include the congregation,[2] the trustees hold the legal title to the church property in trust for the congregation,[3] and each member of the church becomes entitled to a beneficial interest in the property of the church so long as his or her connection or membership continues.[4] Under others, the congregation or society is the incorporated body,[5] and whatever property it acquires, whether it be real or personal, is vested in interest in the body corporate;[6] and while the officers have it under their control or dominion, whatever possession they have, is the possession of the artificial person whose agents they are.[7] But where a conveyance is made to trustees without naming them the title vests in the corporation named in the deed.[8] In the absence of a declared, or clearly implied, trust,[9] the trustees of an incorporated religious society do not hold the property for any church in general, nor for the benefit of any peculiar doctrines or tenets of faith and practice in religious matters, but solely for the society or congregation whose officers they are,[10] and the trustees of an unincorporated religious society which recognized the authority in spiritual affairs of the parent society from which it sprung but not in temporal affairs hold the property for the use exclusively of the members of the branch society.[11]

[§ 113] (3) Conveyance and Donations to Minister or Bishop of Church.[12] A deed to a minister of a parish and his successors,[13] or to a bishop and to his successors and assigns forever,[14] or to a bishop, his heirs and assigns forever in trust for the church,[15] vests a fee-simple title in such bishop, in trust for the church, in the absence of any condition subsequent, either expressed or implied;[16] but the trust attaches to the office of bishop, and not to the person, and therefore passes to his successor.[17] In states which have adopted the legislative policy that church property shall not be otherwise taken and held, or enure, than subject to the control and disposition of the lay members of such church,[18] a Roman Catholic bishop is a mere dry trustee of property owned by a particular congregation with no power to control it or to direct its management in any way,[19] and a resolution of the congregation that the bishop shall hold all the property of the congregation in accordance with the laws, rules and usages of the Roman catholic church where it is shown that such rules invest the bishop with the absolute control of the church property is against public policy and of no effect whatever.[20] In these states donations of money for the care of property of a Roman catholic church belong to the congregation,[21] while donations to the bishop insofar as they are for strictly ecclesiastical purposes having nothing to do with the care of church property are valid and belong to the bishop.[22] But as between an association collecting a fund for building a church for a Roman catholic congregation and the bishop, it has been held that donations belong to the bishop in trust for the congregation.[23]

[§ 114] 7. Conditions.[24] A gift or grant to a religious society may be conditional if the condition is not inconsistent with the gift or grant and its avowed object.[25] The condition may be a condition precedent,[26] in which case title does not vest in the donee or grantee until performance of the condition;[27] or it may be a condition subsequent,[28] in which case title vests at once in the society subject to be divested if the condition is not performed;[29] or it may be a continuing condition,[30] in which case, if the terms of the gift require it, the fund will be retained in trust and the income paid over to the society as long as the condition is complied with.[31] When it is doubtful whether the words of the deed were intended as a condition precedent or subsequent, the courts prefer to construe the conditions as subsequent, so as to give a present estate liable to be divested rather than to defer the vesting.[32] If the act or condition required do not necessarily precede the vesting of the estate, but may accompany or follow it, and if the act may as well be done after as before the vesting of the estate,[33] or if, from the nature of the act to be performed and the time required for its performance, it is evidently the intention of the parties that the estate shall vest and the grantee perform the act after taking possession, then the condition is subsequent.[34] Where land is conveyed by deed containing a condition subsequent requiring its use for church purposes for a limited period of time, a performance of the condition changes the grantee's title from a defeasible to an indefeasible title in fee simple,[35] giving the grantee power to reconvey free of obligation to continue its use for church purposes.[36]

[§ 115] 8. Trusts[37]—a. In General. As in the case of trusts generally,[38] trusts in favor of a religious society are created either by acts of the parties or by operation of law.[39] If created by act of the parties, the grantor must go further than merely state the purpose of the alleged trust; he must establish it by appropriate words,[40] a conveyance for the general use of a religious society[41] or to the trustees of a church congregation not being, per se, a conveyance upon a special trust.[42] Nor can a trust for a church be established by parol evidence as to the use to which the property was put.[43] Where a trust for a religious society is once established, its terms cannot be altered except by the consent of all persons concerned in the original creation of the trust,[44] a subsequent incorporation of the trustees having no effect whatever upon terms on which the property is held.[45] The grantor may reserve the right to make changes affecting the administration of the trust,[46] but a power reserved in those terms does not give the grantor a power to revoke the trust.[47] If land is the subject-matter of a trust by act of the parties, a writing creating it is necessary,[48] but not necessary where created by operation of law.[49] The provision of the statute of frauds requiring declarations of trust to be in writing,[50] has been held not to apply to property held in trust by an incorporated for an unincorporated religious society where the statute regulating such trusts does not require written evidence of the fact that they are so held,[51] a trust being created by force of the statute in such cases.[52] Either by statute or writing, a trust must be created and a trustee duly authorized to hold the legal title in order to give effect to a gift or grant of land to an unincorporated religious society,[53] the nature and extent of the trust depending on the terms of the statute or instrument creating it.[54] Grantees of property for the use of an unincorporated religious society, in the absence of statutory regulation, are trustees only in the sense and to the extent that the trust deed makes them such. They have an estate in the premises of such a duration as is necessary to effect the purposes of the trust,[55] holding the legal title in trust for the true successors and representatives of the society or church as it existed at the time the original deed was made to them.[56] A gift of lands made to trustees to the use of a certain religious society, and such as may succeed them, forever, holding the same principles, is not merely to the society then existing; but if that ceases to exist, or to be of the same faith, the gift is then to any other society holding the same faith, which may succeed them,[57] subject to such other restrictions as the trust deed may place upon beneficiaries.[58] Under a statute so providing,[59] a grant of property to an incorporated religious society for the use of an unincorporated religious society transfers title to such property to the corporation defeasible only upon incorporation by the beneficiary with the consent of the trustee corporation.[60] Following the law relating to trusts generally,[61] a court of equity will enforce the terms of a trust for an unincorporated church on petition of an individual church-member bringing the action on behalf of himself and other members,[62] or of one of various congregations constituting the church petitioning on behalf of itself and the other congregation members.[63] But no action can be maintained against a bishop as trustee of church property,[64] or against a church corporation holding title to property upon an alleged trust for a separate religious society in the absence of evidence establishing the existence of the alleged trust.[65]

[a] To trustees of Christian Science perpetually and irrevocably.—Where a deed conveying property in trust to promote the interests of Christian Science declared that the conveyance was on the perpetual and irrevocable trust and confidence, therein set out, the trust, upon delivery by the donor of the deed and property and the acceptance thereof by the grantees and performance by them of the trust, was an executed trust, not subject to revocation or modification, in the absence of a reservation of an express power to that end. Eustace v. Dickey, 240 Mass. 55, 132 NE 852.

[b] To church trustees for a parsonage.—(1) A deed reciting that land was conveyed for the purpose of a parsonage, church, etc., merely expressed motive of grantor or intention of grantee, and not to create trust for such purpose. Stansbery v. First M. E. Church, 79 Or. 155, 154 P 887. (2) A recital in the deed to trustees of church property that it was purchased for a parsonage does not create a trust, forbidding the use of part of the lot for a church building. Sanders v. Meredith, 78 W. Va. 564, 89 SE 733.

[c] To church trustees for a cemetery.—Where the owners of land deeded it to trustees of a church for a public cemetery, to have and to hold to themselves, successors, heirs, and assigns forever, the deed vested in the church fee-simple title to the land, and the parenthetical expression in the grant that it was for a cemetery was merely limitation of the use to which the land was to be put, and not a limitation of the title, so that it could not be said that under no circumstance did the trustees or church have power to sell. Barker v. Hazel-Fain Oil Co., (Tex. Civ. A.) 219 SW 874.

[d] To B, M, and P as trustees for F church.—A grant without consideration "unto B., M., and P. as trustees for the F. Church," a voluntary unincorporated society, where the instrument contains no specific language indicating a trust, vests legal title in the trustees as the only depositary of title, and is a gift to the church, and not a trust. Brittenbaker v. Buck, 58 Cal. A. 738, 209 P 264.

[a] Joint purchase by trustees of two churches.—One church or congregation or church corporation is not, by a mere joint purchase of real estate with others, made trustee for such others where there is no trust expressed in the conveyance or forming part of any agreement between the purchasers, and the deed is in the ordinary form, running to tenants in common and conveying to each an undivided interest in the land. icated,[67] and in ascertaining the intention the language of the conveyance, if clear and unequivocal, is conclusive;[68] but if the language is indefinite, extrinsic evidence is admissible in ascertaining the intention,[69] such as the faith of the donor,[70] or that professed and taught by the donees,[71] or the circumstances under which the gift was made.[72]

[§ 117] c. Effect of Subsequent Incorporation—(1) In General. The English statute of uses merging the legal and equitable titles in the beneficiary and destroying the trust[73] does not apply to trusts for religious purposes;[74] and by the subsequent incorporation of the beneficiary the legal title is not divested from the trustees and vested in the corporation,[75] except in particular instances where a special act incorporating the society is construed to have that effect.[76] In some states the statutes of uses has been repealed and in lieu thereof general statutes have been enacted providing in substance that where property has been conveyed for the use of an unincorporated religious society, and such society is afterward incorporated, the legal title to such property shall become vested in the corporation,[77] the effect of such a statute being to vest in the corporation itself the title to all property conveyed to trustees for its use without the formality of a conveyance,[78] and its possession of a church building on the property will be presumed although control is not assumed by any formal act or resolution.[79] So also where land is granted to a town for the use of the minister, and his successors, and a church is afterwards incorporated, the church becomes the successor of the town in its parochial capacity, and title vests in the incorporated church by operation of law,[80] and where land is granted to trustees for an unincorporated church, the church when incorporated succeeds to the legal title.[81] Vesting of the title in the society after incorporation may be controlled by the terms of the trust itself, and where the trust deed requires a conveyance by the trustees to the incorporated society upon a contingency named, the title vests by force of the conveyance when made.[82] Where lands are granted for use of the ministry to a person or corporation not in esse, the right to the possession and custody of the lands remains in the grantor,[83] or in the minister until the grantee shall come into existence,[84] and the grantor cannot resume the grant nor alienate the lands without such consent as is necessary for the alienation of other church property.[85] A statute assigning lots of land belonging to the state to particular churches and authorizing the governor to execute deeds to each church as soon as it had built a church on its lot[86] does not postpone conveyance until the church is incorporated; when the church has been built, a deed may be made to trustees for the church until the church is incorporated.[87] So a contract of sale of land to a society, made with the trustees of the society before incorporation, may be enforced in equity after incorporation on the petition of the incorporated society.[88] Under the terms of an incorporating statute expressly giving them that authority,[89] it has been held that trustees of an incorporated religious society have the right to collect subscriptions made for the society at its formation but before its incorporation.[90]

[§ 118] (2) Conveyance by Trustees. Whether or not a conveyance by the trustees to the incorporated society is necessary to a vesting of title in the society is determined by the provisions of the statute, where one exists, and by the terms of the deed creating the trust. In some states title vests in the society when it becomes incorporated by force of the statute,[91] although under the facts as established in some of the cases the decision rests upon the theory of a presumed grant.[92] In these states, a bill in equity to compel the conveyance to the society is unnecessary to perfect the title,[93] although the court may properly make a decree compelling a conveyance for purposes of record.[94] The trust deed may itself provide for termination of the trust and conveyance of legal title to the society upon contingencies named, as, for example, when the society becomes incorporated,[95] or at any time when requested by the society to do so, which assumes a request made after the society or its officers are a body corporate with power to take and hold the title,[96] in which cases title vests in the incorporated society or officers by conveyance.[97] Where under the terms of the trust the vesting of title is by conveyance,[98] the trustee is required to convey notwithstanding a claim by him against the society.[99] Nor can he justify his refusal to convey by the fact that the conveyance had been made to trustees, of which he was one, without his knowledge,[1] or by proof that the contingency named in an agreement between other parties for the making of the conveyance had not yet happened.[2] However, on a bill to compel conveyance, debts incurred by the trustees in good faith and in the exercise of reasonable prudence should be allowed them.[3]

[§ 119] d. Appointment and Removal of Trustees—(1) In General. If the consideration for conveyance of land to trustees for a church was paid by the church, a court of equity will, upon proper application, fill vacancies in the board of trustees by appointing such persons as the church may select;[4] but if paid by the trustees, the legal title is in them, and no appointment is necessary.[5] If the conveyance provides that vacancies shall be filled in a certain manner, such provision is the law of the trust, and must be complied with.[6] In some states the appointment, change, and removal of church trustees is provided for by statute,[7] and the court, in the exercise of its equity powers, will appoint trustees when it is necessary to do so to prevent the failure of the trust,[8] or where the decision of the court has created a vacancy in the board of trustees.[9] But the court will not commit the execution of the trust to persons claiming to be trustees, but whose election is shown to have been secured by improper and illegal means.[10] Trustees named by the grantor in his deed of land for the use of an unincorporated religious society are not removable at the will of the society without cause shown, in the absence of some provision in the trust deed giving it that power.[11] And it must appear that the property held by the trustees will be impaired or the interests and rights of the society will be imperiled if the trustees are not removed to justify their removal by the court.[12] A court order appointing a receiver for a religious corporation and directing that certain parties to the action convey to the receiver their title to the trust property is not an adjudication as to title. In such proceeding the question in whom legal title should ultimately vest is within the discretionary supervision of the court, its determination to rest upon considerations affecting the welfare of the trust.[13]

[§ 120] (2) Under Statute. A statute providing that trustees of land held in trust for a religious society may be appointed, changed and removed by the court on the "application of the proper authorities of the congregation,"[14] restricts the jurisdiction of the court to the appointment, change and removal of the trustees. A decree of the court confining itself to the acts authorized on application made in the way prescribed by statute is valid,[15] but to the extent that the decree directs the administration of the trust property by the trustees appointed, it is void;[16] nor does the fact that the court had a general jurisdiction over the administration of trust property validate a decree made under the statute.[17] Where the trusts specified in the trust deed are inoperative, persons appointed trustees by the court under authority of the statute to fill supposed vacancies obtain no right or title to the property conveyed by force of the statute.[18] A statute providing for appointment of new trustees by the society upon death or removal of the former trustees and the submission to court and the recording of the names of the new trustees,[19] has no application to an attempted appointment of new trustees by a minority of the congregation in opposition to the will of the majority.[20] Nor has a statute providing that where property dedicated for pious uses has no proper or legal custodian, the court may appoint trustees,[21] any application to land granted to grantees named and their heirs and assigns forever for pious uses and where there are heirs in existence in whom the legal title has vested.[22] Where trustees have been removed and new trustees appointed by the court acting under the statute, the newly appointed trustees may recover the trust property from the removed trustees in an action of ejectment,[23] and the defendants in that action cannot question the validity of the new appointment.[24] The removal of trustees and appointment of others in their place under the statute does not have the effect of divesting the church of its property,[25] even where disloyalty to the government in time of war is the ground for their removal.[26]

[§ 121] 9. Forfeiture upon Breach of Condition or Trust.[27] Whether property once given or granted to a religious society reverts to the grantor or his heirs upon failure of the society to use it for the purposes for which it was given depends upon the intention of the parties as disclosed by the terms of the deed or grant.[28] Generally, breach of a condition subsequent works a forfeiture of the estate, and the grantor has a right to enter or to bring his action to recover the estate.[29] But where the deed, in the light of the circumstances surrounding its execution, is construed as disclosing no intention of the parties that a forfeiture should result, the facts that it contains conditions and that they have been broken[30] or that the property was granted for particular pious uses and that it was not so used,[31] will not have that effect, even though the grantees covenanted that they would reconvey to the grantor if the use for which the land was granted was discontinued.[32] A voluntary and unconditional contribution to a church society for the purpose of acquiring and improving property for the use and benefit of the society does not create an express or resulting trust in favor of the donor upon disuse of the property by the society,[33] especially in view of a rule of the denomination to which the church belonged that upon dissolution of a local organization its property would pass to the denomination, the donor being presumed to have made his gift with that rule in mind.[34] A conditional gift may later be changed by the donor into a gift without condition,[35] in which case a breach of the condition cannot be made the basis of a claim that the gift be returned to the donor.[36] A fortiori, such claim cannot be made by trustees of the donee, even though alleging that their claim was made in behalf of the donor.[37] The right to enter for condition broken is a right which can be exercised only by the grantor or his heirs, and if he alienates the right the condition is gone.[38] Where land is deeded in trust for the use of a church so long as used for that purpose, and no longer, it revests in the grantor upon a breach of the trust by operation of the terms of the trust,[39] and abandonment of the church,[40] or of the land for church purposes[41] is a breach of trust within the meaning of this rule. So also a lease to an individual for the benefit of a church society during the time such society might use and occupy the premises as a church and pay the rent creates an estate in fee determinable on the society ceasing to occupy the premises as a church,[42] and the grant of a privilege to build a church on the grantor's land and to have and hold the church so long as the grantees continue to use it as a church conveys an easement in the land terminable on the contingency named.[43] In some states it is held that a grant of land to a church society for the use and purpose of a church is a grant for that special purpose, and when that fails the land reverts to the donor or his heirs,[44] while elsewhere it has been held that a conveyance to trustees of land to be used for the sole purpose of building thereon a church with a provision for perpetuating the trust by authorizing the survivors to convey to new trustees,[45] or by directing that when it ceased to be used for church purposes by the particular church it should go to a denominational organization for denominational purposes,[46] is not a conveyance on condition which is breached by a sale of the land, but a conveyance in trust without any implied restriction against the sale. In the absence of a condition subsequent or a trust provision to that effect in a deed or grant to a religious society, it is held that a subsequent violation of the trust upon which the property is held will not revest either the legal or equitable title in the donors or grantors,[47] although a palpable breach of trust may form a proper ground for application to a court of equity, on the part of the parties interested, to compel a due execution of the trust.[48] A fortiori, where an alienation of land by church trustees with consent of the cestuis que trustent is shown to be in furtherance of the trust purpose,[49] or where land, granted for a particular purpose on condition that it be used for that purpose, is conveyed by trustees to another board of trustees for the express purpose of more effectually carrying out the grantor's design, there is no breach of trust upon which a forfeiture can be predicated.[50] Nor is a condition that if any seats in the church shall be rented or sold, the land shall revert to the grantor, breached by a sale of the church for payment of debts.[51] Nor can a transfer of title and possession be claimed on the ground of breach of trust by trustees in the absence of evidence of the alleged breach.[52]

"The words 'upon condition' are appropriate words for creating a condition, but they do not of necessity create such an estate. Stanley v. Colt, 5 Wall. (U. S.) 119, 18 L. ed. 502, and cases there cited. If it is such an estate, in this case, the forfeiture would be to the grantors or their heirs. But the grantors were merely a committee who had taken their title in trust for the society; and if it were to come back to their heirs by forfeiture, it must be held by them in trust for the society, and thus would merely be turned into a trust estate. Therefore nothing could be gained by a forfeiture, or by treating it as an estate on condition. Taking into consideration the title of the grantors, the purposes of the grant, and the fact that the expression is 'in trust nevertheless, and upon condition always,' the fair construction of the instrument is, that the parties intended the title to be in trust, and that the words 'upon condition' were not used in their technical sense." [§ 122] B. Control, Use, and Disposition[53]—1. Control and Use—a. Right To Control—(1) In Unincorporated Societies. The determination of questions relating to the control and use of church property depends largely upon the form of church government which the members of the church have adopted and to which they adhere,[54] and upon constitutional and statutory provisions relative thereto.[55] In churches which have adopted the congregational form of government without revisory power in a superior church judicatory, the control of church property is in the hands of the majority of the members of the society or other body having charge of its temporalities,[56] and the independent control of the church property by its own members is not affected by its affiliation with other churches or church bodies having advisory powers.[57] In churches which have adopted the presbyterial form of church government, the control of the property of a particular church to the extent that temporalities only are concerned is in the hands of the trustees,[58] but in matters relating to the use and occupation of the church-house for purposes of worship, the trustees' control is itself subject to the control which the judicatories of the church, beginning with the session, exercise over the spiritual affairs of the congregation.[59] Especially is this so where some question of doctrine or faith is in issue.[60] In churches adhering to the episcopal polity, ordinarily the bishop controls both in temporal and spiritual affairs,[61] but in states where the statute requires that title to church property shall be in the congregation regardless of what the canons of the church direct, and that the property shall be subject to the control of the lay members of the congregation subject to any trust terms or conditions that may have been placed thereon,[62] it is held that trustees for the congregation control the use to be made of the church property, subject to episcopal decrees in spiritual matters so long as it is an integral part of the larger church organization,[63] but that during a period of suspension from such larger church organization while an episcopal interdict against it is in force the trustees are free from episcopal control,[64] being again brought into subjection when the interdict is removed.[65]

[§ 123] (2) In Incorporated Societies. The statutes for the incorporation of religious societies generally provide a form of corporate organization in conformity with the rules and discipline of the different denominations, so that the distinctive features of church polity of the congregational, presbyterial and episcopal groups are preserved therein.[66] Where a religious society is incorporated, a majority of the members of the corporation generally control,[67] but subject to the rules and discipline of the church.[68] Where the members of an incorporated society constitute the corporation,[69] a majority of such members control the property,[70] unless by the terms of the incorporating statute, control is placed specifically and exclusively in the trustees.[71] Where the trustees are themselves the corporation,[72] a majority of the trustees control,[73] but their power is subordinate to the customs and rules of the organization, the acts of a majority of the trustees having no binding effect upon a dissenting minority if not conformable thereto,[74] although it has been held under some state statutes that a religious society when incorporated has no denominational character, and that under such statutes a majority of the corporators, without regard to the religious tenets of the church, have the entire control over the property and revenue of the corporation.[75]

[§ 124] b. Effect of Provisions in Deed or Will. Where the legal title by the terms of a deed is held by trustees for the use of a religious society but not upon any particular trust the control of the property is determined by the rules and discipline of the church for whose use the property is held,[76] the control being with a majority of the church members,[77] or in the hands of a conference or associated body where the rules of the church so provide.[78] Where a deed conveying property to or for a church or a church organization creates special trusts and provides particularly for what purpose and in what manner the trust is to be administered, the terms of the trust deed constitute the organic law of the trust, and questions as to what persons or bodies have control of the property and as to the limitations on their power are to be determined by reference thereto.[79] So where land is granted to trustees in trust for such members of the congregation as shall adhere to a particular faith or church discipline, the control of the property is in the hands of the members adhering,[80] and trustees of unincorporated[81] and incorporated societies[82] are equally bound. But where real estate is conveyed to a society or congregation in its corporate capacity, and not in trust for the benefit of the religious denomination to which it belongs, it is not subject to the control of any ecclesiastical judicatory.[83] And where a will leaves property in trust for purposes named to a particular church but without regard to its connection with any particular church body, the control within the limits fixed by the will is in the hands of a majority of the members of the church named without regard to its denominational connections or to its adherence to a particular faith.[84]

[§ 125] c. Use, Repairs, Removal, and Change of Location—(1) In General. The society, or its trustees, has the right to regulate the use of the church edifice,[85] or of a building constructed for parish purposes generally on church property by an associated church guild with the permission of the vestry,[86] and, acting through duly authorized committees, may contract for such professional services as are properly a part of its devotional exercises.[87] It may even oust persons worshiping in the church building whenever, having power to do so, it decides to convert it to some other use than for the holding of divine services.[88] Its regulations must be in conformity with church rules and discipline,[89] and, in the case of property held under special trusts, with the requirements of the deed or will creating the trust.[90] Where its regulations are in conformity with the church rules and discipline, they will be enforced against one acting in defiance thereof.[91] It may make repairs, alterations, and improvements,[92] and whenever necessary or proper, take down the old edifice and rebuild on the same spot or elsewhere,[93] or it may change its location, and erect a new edifice elsewhere;[94] nor will equity interfere to restrain such removal where it is clearly established that a majority of the corporators are in favor of removal, even though there had been no legal expression of the will of the corporators at a corporate meeting regularly called,[95] unless some breach of trust is involved.[96] The power to remove is sometimes expressly conferred by statute,[97] although if the power is granted by special act and is contingent upon the destruction or serious injury "of the then existing church building," it is not a continuing power and is exhausted by its exercise.[98] Under a statute giving it authority to do so,[99] a religious society may build associate churches or chapels in the city where it is located whenever in its judgment it becomes necessary or expedient for the accommodation of its members to do so.[1] Where trustees act as agents of an incorporated society in regard to repairs, improvements and changes on the church property, they must carry out the reasonable and legal will and wishes of the corporation,[2] but the presumption is that they have done so in the absence of evidence to the contrary.[3] Where the question is one not of agency, but of title, as where the legal title to the church edifice is vested in another person or body than the congregation, the congregation have no right to tear it down for the purpose of repairing or rebuilding it, without the consent of such other person or body.[4]

[§ 126] (2) Joint Use by Several Societies or by Several Church Groups of United Society. Where two or more societies jointly use and occupy the same church edifice, the rights of the individual societies to its use will be determined by the deed[5] or the agreement controlling its use.[6] Where the deed gives the first right to use for religious rites and ceremonies to one of the churches, its right to priority is limited to a use for religious ceremonies, the other churches being then entitled to use it for the same purpose before the church having the prior right can use it for doctrinal discourses.[7] The society holding the legal title to the church edifice under the deed is the proper custodian thereof,[8] and is entitled to reasonable notice of the time when the other churches desire to use the building,[9] and may determine the right to its use as between several applicants who have selected the same time for its use.[10] But where the use of the building and the time of use are specifically provided for in the constitution and by-laws of the corporation holding the legal title, the various churches are entitled to the use at the times provided for without application or notice to the corporation.[11] Where the agreement controlling the use of a church building by two churches restricts its use to divine services, the restriction has been construed to prohibit the holding of a Sunday school by either of the churches,[12] but a prayer-meeting is held to be a divine service within the meaning of such a contract.[13] Where two churches by agreement organize a united society and provide for the management of the joint property by the society, one of the churches on its own initiative and without the consent of the united society cannot offer the use of the church edifice which it occupies to a third church and enter into an agreement with such third church for its joint use.[14]

[§ 127] d. Remedies for Improper Exclusion. If members are improperly excluded from the use of the church property, they must apply to the courts for redress, or appeal to the congregation.[15] They cannot resort to acts of trespass to gain entrance to the church, and if they do so they are liable as trespassers,[16] or if their entry is forcible, they may be dispossessed by an order of court in an action for forcible entry and detainer restoring possession to those formerly in possession.[17] But a trustee of a religious society cannot be sued by his cotrustees as trespasser in relation to the property of the society.[18] A majority of the trustees cannot by any rule or resolution exclude one of their number and so divest him of his rights as to make his subsequent act of obtaining possession of the trust property a tort.[19]

[§ 128] 2. Alienation and Encumbrance[20]—a. In General. A religious society, generally speaking, may sell and convey land which it owns subject to such restrictions and requirements as may be contained in its own constitution or by-laws,[21] or in statutes applicable thereto,[22] the statute prevailing over rules of the church wherever there is a conflict,[23] or in the provisions of trust deeds or of wills under which it holds the property.[24] Where it is manifest from the terms of trust deed or will or charter under which church lands are held that the trustees named therein and their successors should only hold the naked legal title for the benefit of the body of worshippers, the trustees have no interest in the land which they can convey away from the body of worshippers.[25] The property can be disposed of only by the body of worshippers or church as a church by complying with the provisions of the instrument creating the trust and as authorized by the laws and constitution of the church,[26] the proper method of ascertaining the will of the majority of the members of the church being that prescribed in its charter or by-laws with reference to the transaction of its secular business.[27] Nor has a part only of a church named in the deed as beneficiary power to transfer the title in the absence of evidence of authority to represent the entire church.[28]

In the Philippines, the Roman catholic church is the owner of the churches, atrios, convents and cemeteries where it is shown that they are built upon sacred ground withdrawn from the commerce of men.[29] Religious orders affiliated with the Roman catholic church have no power to dispose of such places or buildings located on haciendas owned by them.[30]

[§ 129] b. Sale Generally—(1) By Members or Trustees of Unincorporated Society—(a) In General. Property owned by an unincorporated society may be conveyed by its members acting individually,[31] or by trustees where the legal title is vested in them,[32] but not by officers of the congregation having no title.[33] The grantors, members or trustees, must observe the requirements contained in the organic law of the society governing conveyances by them,[34] and in statutes applicable thereto,[35] but they are not bound by statutory requirements applicable solely to religious corporations.[36] Statutes dealing with unincorporated religious societies and providing for their organization under the statute by election of trustees do not operate to deprive an unincorporated society which has not organized under the statute of its right to convey its property. Trustees of such a society named by the instrument creating the trust may convey the legal title when authorized by the members of the society, the trustees acting under the trust deed, not under the statute.[37]

[§ 130] (b) Consent of Members to Sale by Trustees. The consent or approval of members or of certain boards or officers of the society is necessary to a conveyance by trustees whenever and to the extent required by the constitution of the society,[38] or by the trust deed under which the property is held by the society;[39] but a consent secured informally and orally is sufficient in the absence of requirements to the contrary,[40] especially where it is shown that the uniform and unvaried practice has been to manifest approval verbally in informal consultation.[41] A consent given at a meeting of the members duly called is sufficient,[42] and notice of a meeting given by ringing the church bell is sufficient where that is shown to be the customary way of calling church meetings.[43]

[§ 131] (2) By Incorporated Society—(a) In General. An incorporated religious society, acting under statutory or charter authority, may sell property which it owns, subject to statutory or charter restrictions,[44] and in conformity to and in furtherance of the trust under which the property may be held.[45] Property owned by a corporation free of trust may be conveyed by it free of any encumbrance,[46] and where the conveyance by trustees acting for the corporation in good faith is made for a valid consideration and in conformity to the vote of a majority of the corporate members, it is valid as against the protest of the minority.[47] The power of alienation is in the corporate body, whether it be parish,[48] society or congregation,[49] trustees,[50] rector, wardens, and vestrymen,[51] or the minister as corporation sole,[52] provided, however, in cases where statute, trust deed or church rules require it, that the consent of congregation,[53] church judicatory,[54] or the sanction of the court[55] be first obtained. Where a church corporation acts through authorized officers or trustees, the validity of a sale of church property by officers or trustees de facto cannot be collaterally attacked.[56] Restraints may be imposed by statute on the power of a religious corporation to alienate property,[57] as, for example, that it cannot alienate unless upon a valuable consideration inuring to the corporation as such,[58] or only after it has applied to the court for permission to sell and the court has sanctioned the transaction.[59] Restraint upon alienation by a religious corporation imposed by charter may later be removed by the legislative will, whether expressed in a special or general act.[60]

Inasmuch as the necessity for the approbation of the ministry and elders is found, not in any statute, but solely in the voluntary agreement of the community itself, the community has a right to interpret its own requirements and its interpretation long and invariably followed is decisive of the question of whether the approbation of the ministry and elders was properly obtained in the case at bar." "It is first claimed that the property cannot be sold, and a good title to it cannot be given, by reason of a trust imposed upon it. The deed to the corporation is absolute and without condition or reservation. It created no trust beyond that general duty which the law puts upon a corporation of using its property for the purposes contemplated in its creation. That sort of trust is not one which fastens upon the land and inheres in the title, going with it where it passes or restraining alienation, but founded solely upon the corporate character of the grantee, and so justifying the control which the statute gives to the courts. The title of the church is an absolute fee which it can transmit to a vendee with the judicial consent and approval. When that occurs the proceeds take the place of the land and become the corporate property which the court, by a suitable direction, devotes to the proper uses and purposes which the corporation was framed to subserve, and to accomplish which its property was bestowed. It is in no respect diverted from the religious corporation, or even from its denominational uses, and so far as there is an element of trust a sale is consistent with and not destructive of it." [§ 132] (b) Authorization Generally. Authorization at a meeting duly called[61] and at which a quorum was present,[62] is necessary to the validity of a sale by a religious corporation.[63] Where the members of the society constitute the incorporated body,[64] consent of the corporation is necessary to a sale of the church property by the trustees,[65] and trustees acting without the consent of the corporation have no title to convey, and their deed executed under such circumstances is void,[66] even though a special act of the legislature purports to give them authority to do so.[67] A fortiori, an instrument purporting to be the deed of an incorporated church, executed by the pastor and a minority of the trustees, without the authority of the church body, has no validity regardless of recitals of authorization made therein.[68] Also where the statute requires it,[69] the consent of the congregation must first be obtained by the trustees even where the trustees are themselves the corporation,[70] but in such case it has been held that a statute requiring consent of the congregation to a sale by the trustees does not require their consent to a mortgage by the trustees.[71]

[§ 133] (c) Notice of Meeting To Authorize Alienation.[72] The notice of meeting to authorize alienation of property belonging to an incorporated religious society must follow the requirements of statute or charter or by-laws,[73] or in the absence of provisions in charter or by-laws, as the officers of the corporation in their warrant for the meeting shall direct.[74] Special notice is not required where authority for the sale is voted at a regular annual meeting,[75] or at an adjourned session of such annual meeting.[76] Where due notice is given, the meeting fairly conducted, the objection that the vote was illegal for want of a proper register is of no force.[77]

[§ 134] c. Sale for Payment of Debts—(1) Voluntary Sale. A religious society may dispose of its property to pay its debts when necessary for that purpose;[78] and unless restrained by charter or statute, it may assign its property in trust for the payment of its debts.[79]

[§ 135] (2) Involuntary Sale. If a religious society or its trustees refuses to sell its property to pay its debts, a court of equity, in the absence of a statutory prohibition, will enforce the sale in a proceeding in rem,[80] or will declare an equitable lien and enter judgment directing a sale of the property as in mortgage foreclosure,[81] or, upon petition stating the facts, will grant an injunction to prevent any disposition of the church property before the result of an action at law shall be reached.[82] Unless exempted by statute, a church edifice is subject to a mechanic's lien,[83] and to seizure and sale under execution.[84] Nor will informalities in the execution defeat the purchaser's title where they have been waived by the church corporation.[85] Where, after the sale of the property of a church under a decree of court for the payment of its debts, a surplus remains, that surplus is held as the whole fund or property was held, and no other or different condition can be attached to it.[86]

[§ 136] d. Mortgage or Other Lien—(1) In General. In some states there are restrictions by statute or charter on the power of religious societies to give a mortgage,[87] a society having no power whatever where its charter expressly prohibits it to give a mortgage or to suffer a lien to be placed on its church or grounds,[88] or, where the statute so provides,[89] having such power only upon application to the court in each case for permission to exercise it,[90] the court in that event having jurisdiction to make a decree free of the limitations placed upon the mortgaging power of the society by the church canons.[91] Where legislative policy permits the giving of mortgages by religious societies, it must be done in conformity with regulations contained in statute, charter or by-laws, and in pursuance of authority granted by the society to its officers or trustees.[92] A statute giving religious societies power to mortgage but further providing that nothing in the statute shall affect a resulting trust in favor of grantor contained in any deed conveying the lands in trust,[93] in no way restricts the power of a society to mortgage lands not subject to a resulting trust expressed in the deed to the society but conveyed for a substantial monetary consideration to the society and where a resulting trust, if any arose by operation of law, would be in favor of the society.[94] Where the society has accepted benefits from a mortgage which it has not authorized, it is either estopped to question the authority of its trustees and officers to make the conveyance,[95] or it must restore the consideration paid as a condition precedent to a decree of court canceling the mortgage.[96] And where authority to make the mortgage is granted by the society, a member participating is estopped to deny the validity of the proceedings.[97]

"The restraint upon alienation imposed by the charter in the church council or corporation was made for the protection of the interests of the church body. The disability inheres solely in the legal entity called the corporation, and not in the nature of the estate or the character of the church body. It is therefore, capable of removal by the legislative will, whether expressed in a special or general act. An authority to sell for the benefit of the congregation conferred by law, would impair no contract and violate no law." Burton's App., supra.

[§ 137] (2) By Members or Trustees of Unincorporated Society. Under a statute conferring power to mortgage upon trustees of an unincorporated religious society where a debt is contracted for building or repairing a church or other church building, or for the purchase of land for church purposes,[98] trustees named in a deed of land to an unincorporated society who are later duly elected by the society have the power to mortgage under the statute.[99] But they must have authority from the society to make the mortgage.[1] Trustees of an unincorporated religious society have no power to mortgage the church property in the absence of authority from the society to do so in the form either of a vote granting the authority in express terms, deed, or church rules and discipline.[2] Such authority must be express and special.[3] It cannot be implied from authority to the trustees to proceed with the building of the church and to do whatever was necessary in the premises.[4]

[§ 138] (3) By Incorporated Society. A church corporation, having power to take and hold real estate,[5] may mortgage it as security for repayment of money borrowed for legitimate corporate purposes,[6] but its trustees have no power to initiate proceedings to mortgage the corporate property in the absence of authority by vote, deed or church rules and discipline to do so.[7] Where the corporation has a congregational form of government the consent of a majority of the members of the congregation to the giving of the mortgage must first be obtained, where its charter or the governing statute so provides,[8] but a mortgage of church property in the usual form of a corporate mortgage, signed by the president and attested by the secretary of the corporation, is presumably executed with the authority of the corporation.[9]

[§ 139] e. Validity[10]—(1) In General. A sale of property of a religious society to be valid must conform to the requirements of law to which it is subject, the statute law of the state,[11] the rules and discipline of its own church constitution,[12] even where they add to the statutory requirements, provided, however, there is no inconsistency or statutory prohibition involved,[13] and the limitations and restrictions in a trust deed or will under which the property may be held.[14] It must meet the common law requirements of a valid contract of sale of land.[15] If there has been a failure of consideration, the society making the conveyance may rescind and procure its cancellation.[16] In the case of trust property, a lease[17] or sale[18] in furtherance of the trust, if it conforms to law in other respects, is valid. For example, a religious society having power to remove its meeting-house from one location to another,[19] may sell and convey the real property on which the church building stands free of the trust on which it holds it in order that with the proceeds it may purchase new land and erect a new building, holding the newly acquired property on the same trusts as the old.[20]

"There is no good reason why a perpetual restraint should be placed upon the alienation of the estate of religious societies. That which is suited to the present, by a change of times becomes unfit for the future. The unpretending church or modest parsonage, or primitive schoolhouse of a village or borough town becomes unsuited to the growth, situation and progress of taste and culture of a large city. The ground itself often becomes the most valuable possession, and by a sale may add greatly to the welfare of the body, enabling it to erect finer edifices, better adapted to the change of times and circumstances. Conversion is not destruction, and can be made for the benefit of the trust. No solid objection lies to the change of church property so long as its true purpose is preserved. . . . A sale is frequently the best mode of executing the trust." Burton's App., supra.

[20] Starr v. Starr Methodist Prot-

[§ 140] (2) Consent of Superior Church Judicatory or Conference. The consent of a superior church judicatory to the conveyance by a religious society, although required by the canons of the church, is not necessary where the statute authorizing the conveyance grants the power to convey without any such restriction,[21] but is necessary where the statute follows the church law in this respect.[22] An association or conference of churches has itself no power of alienation of land devised to an individual church of the conference.[23] But where land is held by a church subject to church rules and discipline and a sale is made which is within the terms of a church rule requiring the consent of the conference, a failure to secure the consent of the conference invalidates the sale.[24] The church rule must in terms apply to the particular transaction to give it that effect.[25] A church rule requiring consent of the conference to a sale or mortgage of property held by trustees for an individual church does not apply to a sale of property which had been conveyed directly to an individual church corporation without the intervention of trustees. Property so held may be sold by the church corporation without the consent of the conference.[26] Whether such consent is necessary under the New York statute requiring trustees to hold and administer church property according to the rules and usages of the denomination to which the church members of the corporation belong, has been raised but not decided, it appearing in the particular case that the judicatory consented to the sale on conditions which were performed.[27]

[§ 141] (3) Sanction of Court or Legislature—(a) In General. Independently of statute, a court of equity has inherent power to order a sale of property held in trust for a religious society where such action is necessary to the execution of the purposes of the trust and for the protection of the estate and the rights of the beneficiaries.[28] And this power of the equity court to direct a conveyance of a trust estate in furtherance of the trust may be exercised by the legislature in a special statute authorizing the trustees of a particular church to convey the lands held in trust.[29]

[§ 142] (b) Statutory Leave of Court—aa. Necessity.[30] Under the laws of some states,[31] a religious corporation is not authorized to sell or mortgage any of its real estate without leave of court,[32] although it has been held under early statutes requiring court sanction for a conveyance by a religious corporation,[33] that a valid mortgage could be given without such sanction,[34] and under statutes permissive in terms rather than mandatory it is held that a failure to obtain an order of court does not defeat the grantee's title to the land conveyed.[35]

[§ 143] bb. Purpose and Scope of Statute. It is not the purpose of the statute to give the court power to control or manage the property of a religious corporation,[36] but merely power to prevent the misapplication of its funds.[37] The statute applies only to religious corporations,[38] only to domestic corporations,[39] only to real property,[40] only to a sale as distinguished from an assignment[41] or from an agreement accompanying the sale,[42] only to a sale by the corporation of its own property as distinguished from a conveyance by a corporation trustee to the beneficiary,[43] or by trustees of an unincorporated church to the church after it has been incorporated,[44] and only to a sale which the corporation has a legal right to make.[45] Where however the statutory consent of the congregation to a sale by the trustees of the corporation has not been obtained,[46] the sanction of the court has been held to cure the defect where the statute in express terms gives it that effect,[47] although in the absence of any such provision, the court has no jurisdiction to direct a sale which has not the consent of the congregation when the statute requires it.[48] The statute does not prohibit a religious corporation from making, without such consent, an executory contract of sale preliminary to conveyance; and it is sufficient if the consent be obtained after the contract, and before the time of conveying the property.[49]

[§ 144] cc. Application—(aa) Who May Make. In the absence of any restrictions upon their power in respect to such an application, or of any requirement that there should be a vote of the congregation to sanction their action, the vestry or trustees of a church may apply to the court to be allowed to sell or mortgage its real estate.[50] But a court has no jurisdiction to sanction the sale upon the application of a pewholder as pewholder,[51] or upon application of trustees where the consent of the lay members required by statute has not been obtained,[52] or of a faction of a church where neither the church corporation or its trustees have been made parties thereto.[53]

[§ 145] (bb) Contents. The application should state the reasons for the sale,[54] compliance with the statutory requirements as to authorization by the congregation,[55] when the property was acquired by the society if there is a contention that it was acquired before the statute requiring leave of court was enacted,[56] and the proposed application of the moneys arising therefrom.[57]

[§ 146] dd. Objections to Order and Right To Intervene. For sufficient reasons the court may withhold its assent and so prevent the sale or the proposed disposition of the proceeds,[58] but it has no power to order a sale or an application of the proceeds against the will of the petitioners.[59] It is not a sufficient reason for withholding assent that a sale of the church edifice will deprive a pewholder of his pew,[60] or that the proceeds of the sale are to be used for the payment of the corporation's debts,[61] the proceeds taking the place of the land,[62] or that the proceedings for the sale are to procure the use of the property for purposes which will be detrimental to the interests of an adjoining owner, in the absence of violation of a vested right.[63] But a sale or lease by a religious society will not be sanctioned if it violates vested rights of a third party,[64] not unless such rights are fully protected in the order directing the sale.[65] Nor can an adjoining owner, in the absence of violation of some vested right, intervene to oppose

For many years it received money under the terms of the lease as delay rentals. During the term of that lease, the society received a more advantageous offer for an oil lease on the same property from another party. The society applied for sanction of court to the oil lease, repudiating the gas lease on ground that it had never been sanctioned by court. The court ordered a confirmation of the gas lease or a refund of the delay rentals received thereunder. Samples v. United Fuel Gas Co., 100 W. Va. 441, 130 SE 670.

the sale,[66] even though his title and the title to the church property are derived from a common source.[67] But where there are conflicting claims to the right of possession and control of church property, proceedings on application for its sale will be stayed until the claims are definitely determined.[68] Under statutes in some states,[69] the proceeding is ex parte and no provision is made for letting in anybody to defend,[70] and a claimant not being allowed to intervene, his rights will not be affected by any order or decree that may be made.[71]

[§ 147] ee. Order of Court. The granting of the order directing the sale or mortgage is discretionary with the court.[72] If the reasons stated are within the law and the application of proceeds proper, the court sanctions the agreement for the sale and directs a conveyance in pursuance of its terms,[73] or it authorizes the making of a mortgage free of the limitations placed upon the mortgaging power of the society by the church canons.[74] The order, if made, is permissive, not mandatory.[75] It usually directs the application of the proceeds,[76] but its failure to do so is no objection to its validity.[77] However, an order directing an application which the trustees are not legally authorized to make is void,[78] and will not legalize a distribution in accordance with its terms.[79]

[§ 148] ff. Review. The sanctioning order being discretionary with the court,[80] it will not be reviewed by the appellate court,[81] if based on facts before the court at the time the decision is made.[82] A decision based on facts not before the court is void,[83] even though the existence of facts which would have justified the decision is afterwards established by proof.[84]

[§ 149] (4) Publication of Notice of Sale. Statutory requirements for publication of the notice of sale of church property must be complied with,[85] and it has been held that publication in a daily paper for the required number of weeks before the sale is not a sufficient compliance with a statute requiring publication in a weekly paper,[86] even though in the particular instance publication in the daily paper is admittedly more effective advertising than publication in a weekly paper.[87]

[§ 150] (5) Repudiation and Ratification.[88] A religious corporation may repudiate an unauthorized conveyance,[89] even though the purchaser has paid the consideration and has been put in possession,[90] but must return to a purchaser in possession all he has paid upon faith of the supposed title.[91] On the other hand a religious society that has power to direct its trustees to sell or mortgage property has power to ratify irregular action taken by the trustees,[92] as where they acted without the direction or the assent of the society,[93] or where the meeting to authorize the trustees was called without proper notice.[94] Ratification in order to validate the sale must be by the church body which under the rules and discipline of the church has the power to convey.[95] Ratification need not be by a direct proceeding with an express intent to ratify, but may be effected indirectly, and by acts of recognition or acquiescence, or acts inconsistent with repudiation or disapproval,[96] as where the society accepts and retains the benefits of the unauthorized transaction,[97] or, in the case of a mortgage, pays the interest thereon.[98] Also a member of a congregation will be estopped to deny the regularity of the meeting called to authorize a deed by his own participation therein without objection,[99] and a parent church whose minister with its authority has confirmed the execution of a deed by trustees of a branch church cannot later deny its validity.[1] Ratification relates back to the date of execution of the deed if no rights have intervened which would be prejudiced thereby.[2]

[§ 151] f. Construction and Operation of Conveyance[3]—(1) In General. Both land and buildings are conveyed by a deed from a religious society referring to the subject of the conveyance as the entire property of the society, even though reference is made in another part of the conveyance to the building only.[4] Where a religious corporation conveys property to another by deed under which the grantee covenants that he will pay certain taxes and not convey to another except with the consent of the corporation, a reconveyance by the grantee with the grantor's consent by deed containing the same covenants is binding upon the second grantee, making him liable for the taxes of his predecessor in title still unpaid.[5] A conveyance of land by an incorporated association of churches to trustees appointed by the association for the establishment of a school does not operate to make the individual churches which are members of the association tenants-in-common of the school property so as to entitle a member church to petition for a partition of the school property.[6]

[§ 152] (2) Breach of Condition Subsequent and Remedies Therefor. A condition in a deed from a religious society as grantor that the grantee will use the property for religious instruction is broken upon abandonment of religious for secular instruction,[7] and a condition requiring instruction in the denominational faith of the grantor is broken by an abandonment of denominational for instruction in a form of general evangelical christianity.[8] A covenant by grantee in deed from a church to continue a school is not broken by sale of the land and removal of the school to other property,[9] so that the consent of the original grantor to a sale of the land by the grantee is not a waiver of its right to enforce the grantee's liability for the subsequent breach of his covenant.[10] Title on breach of condition contained in a deed from the trustees of a religious society as grantors reverts to the trustees of that society or their successors and not to the trustees of another affiliated society.[11] When a religious society conveys property to another on condition that its present use will be continued by the grantee and that if such use shall at any time be discontinued, the property shall revert to the grantor or a payment of a fixed sum in lieu thereof shall be made by the grantee at his option, the grantee upon breach of condition and refusal to return the property or pay the money, becomes liable to the grantor in an action to recover the money,[12] which liability accrues within the meaning of the statute of limitations not when the grantee committed the breach of condition, but when he disavowed any intention to return the property and denied the alternative obligation to pay the money.[13]

[§ 153] 3. Diversion[14]—a. In General. Property or funds held by a religious society, or its officers, in trust for certain specified purposes cannot be diverted to any other use,[15] as from religious to secular uses;[16] from denominational control to control by others outside of the denomination;[17] from one branch to another branch of the same denomination, the two branches holding different doctrines;[18] from a free church to a church under denominational control;[19] from a particular church, entitled under the terms of the trust deed to the entire property, to a group of churches of which the original beneficiary is one, all sharing in the fund;[20] from a managing board of a particular church, constituted as provided for by the church law and as referred to in the deed of trust, to a board enlarged by methods in violation of the church constitution;[21] from a permanent fund for the support of the ministry at a particular place established by irrevocable gifts of subscribers to a fund of fluctuating amount diminished by the return to subscribers of amounts contributed by them.[22] But where the terms of the trust place the control of the church property in the majority of the congregation without denominational restrictions, there is no diversion involved in the majority going from one denomination to another and carrying the church property with them.[23] Conversion of trust property is not diversion, necessarily,[24] and trustees of church property, even though held on special trusts, may sell it free of trust when such sale is in furtherance of the purposes of the trust, and with the proceeds buy other property and hold it subject to the trust, provided there is nothing in the deed of trust prohibiting such conversion.[25]

[§ 154] b. Statutes Authorizing Change in Use. A diversion of trust property cannot be legalized by statute.[26] But the constitutionality of a statute authorizing certain persons named as individuals, who are trustees of a religious corporation but not so described in the statute, to make a use of the corporate property not hitherto authorized, cannot be raised in an action to which the corporation, but not the trustees individually, are made parties.[27] A statute amending the charter or enlarging the powers of a religious corporation, or authorizing a change of use, is not a diversion of property given in trust for the use of the corporation,[28] or on terms so flexible as to be coterminous with its powers.[29] Nor is a statute authorizing a change in the use of the property a diversion where the trust is itself the creature of statute,[30] or of a deed or will subjecting it to legislative control.[31] Nor are surplus funds of a religious corporation diverted by the statutory authorization of their use for purposes other than those provided for in the original charter, where the original purposes of the trust fund have been realized and no diversion of funds from those purposes is involved.[32]

[§ 155] c. Change of Doctrine and Discipline—(1) By Majority of Trustees or Church Members—(a) In General. The scope of the restrictions upon the power of the constituted authorities or of the majority of the church members to change their faith and take the church property with them is determined by the terms of the church constitution or of the trust under which the property is held.[33] Where no breach of agreement or trust is involved in a division of church membership, both majority and minority adhering to the faith, a division of the property on equitable principles is generally made.[34]

[§ 156] (b) In Violation of Compact or Trust. Where a church has adopted adherence to a particular faith or a form of church government requiring adherence as the basis of its organic law, or where its property is held on trusts or conditions requiring such adherence, the constituted authorities, or the majority of a church, who change its doctrines and discipline by abandoning the adopted faith, either becoming independent or uniting with another denomination, cannot take with them the trust property of the church, and the right to use such property remains in those who adhere to the original doctrine and discipline, no matter how small in number they may be.[35] A fortiori, where the majority adhere to the old faith, a seceding minority cannot lawfully take possession of the property and exclude the majority,[36] unless they can prove that in fact they are the adherents and that the majority are the secessionists.[37] Where the church constitution or the trust under which its property is held requires merely adherence to a particular faith but not subjection to any particular synod or judicatory, the majority of a church which has the congregational type of government may change its synod connections without forfeiture of property rights, provided only they adhere to the faith.[38] They may even differ from the minority as to the interpretation of certain provisions in the articles of faith and follow their own interpretation in the use of the property without forfeiting their rights in it so long as they do not depart from the characteristic doctrines and practices of the adopted faith of the church.[39] And judicatories of the same faith may unite and take their property into the consolidated body, where their constitutions permit it,[40] but they cannot go beyond their constitutional powers.[41] Where neither constitutional nor trust restrictions impose upon the society any obligation to maintain a particular faith or form of worship,[42] or particular denominational connections,[43] or where the church is independent and the connection between church and synod is merely voluntary,[44] the majority of the trustees or church members may change its faith or its church connections and take the church property with them,[45] but in such case as between two factions of a church membership, one continuing the organization and its activities and the other withdrawing and disbanding, the former is entitled to the property, regardless of its numbers, and the faction which has withdrawn and disbanded, cannot by later reorganizing and claiming to be the majority of the original group take over the property.[46] Even where a church has established and maintained its synodical connections under a trust or constitutional obligation and does not claim independence, the majority may determine to which one of two conflicting judicatories it will adhere without forfeiture of its property.[47]

[§ 157] (c) In Violation of Charter or Statute. Where land is held by an incorporated parish for the support of public worship without regard to any particular faith,[48] or by an incorporated society free of denominational control,[49] a change of faith and appropriation of the church property for worship under the new tenets by the majority of the congregation or corporation is not a diversion in the absence of special trust requirements holding the property to the old faith.[50] But where under the statute, the incorporated society holds its property subject to denominational control of the church with which it is connected,[51] or for the support of a particular faith but independent of synodical control,[52] a majority of the corporate members cannot divert the property to other uses opposed to the denomination or the faith which the corporation was created to support.[53]

[§ 158] (2) Under Authority of Superior Judicatory. A church which by trust obligation or by its constitution is subject to the ecclesiastical authority of a superior judicatory may accept such changes of faith and discipline as are made or authorized by the judicatory and continue to hold their property thereafter subject to the new faith and discipline,[54] provided the superior judicatory itself had authority to make the change.[55] The unlawful change of the constitution and confession of faith by the superior judicatory does not authorize a new use of its property by the individual church. In such case those who adhere to the original constitution and confession of faith are entitled to the use of the property.[56] This question does not arise with reference to the property of a church which has adopted an independent form of church government and where the association or council or conference or convention of churches in the denomination functions merely in an advisory capacity.[57]

[§ 159] (3) Materiality. To constitute a diversion of church property, a change in the doctrine which the church is obligated by trust or its constitution to maintain must materially affect some fundamental belief in the confession of faith.[58] Such a change will not be inferred necessarily from the dismissal of one minister and the employment of another,[59] or by permitting a low-church episcopalian rector, degraded from the ministry by the high-church bishop, to continue in his office where it was shown that the property was held under no special trust, and that contributions had been made with the understanding that the church, which was low-church, should be independent of the control of the high-church bishop.[60] A diversion of property is not necessarily to be inferred from a mere change in the name of the church,[61] especially where it appears that the name used in the deed creating the trust was a misnomer,[62] or by mere alterations in expression or fuller and clearer statements of doctrine in the confession of faith,[63] or by incorporating into the confession of faith of a church the doctrines previously contained in its discipline to which all members must have subscribed before they became members,[64] or from a mere difference of opinion between factions as to the manner in which confessions of sins should be made where it appeared that both factions admitted that confession of sins is necessary as a condition precedent to the reception of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper,[65] or by the teaching of "absolute predestination" or of "limited predestination" in a primitive baptist church, where it appeared that those learned in the doctrine of the church disagreed as to whether God predestined all things which happen or only those things which come to pass with reference to the salvation of souls.[66]

[§ 160] d. Right To Claim Diversion as Ground of Forfeiture. Even though a congregation has forfeited its rights to trust property by a change of ecclesiastical connection, that fact cannot be taken advantage of by former members of the congregation who have abandoned their claim to the property, withdrawn and built a new church for themselves.[67] Nor can a lessee of a religious society set up a change of doctrine as a defense in an action by the society against him to recover the rent.[68] Nor in the case of a remainder in fee devised to the rector and wardens of a certain church and their successors and which had vested in them, can a stranger in possession take advantage of the fact that the church had changed its discipline and form of worship, when the church after the death of the life tenant brings an action to oust him.[69]

[§ 161] e. Protection and Enforcement of Trust—(1) In General. A court of equity will aid the lawfully elected trustees of a religious society in the administration of their trust by compelling a conveyance to them of the legal title to the property,[70] and by protecting them from threatened interference with the use of the church property,[71] where the threatened interference would constitute a serious or irreparable injury.[72] Conversely equity may be resorted to for the purpose of compelling the trustees, or other officers holding property or funds of the society in trust, to use and apply such property and funds to the purpose for which the trust was created and of restraining them from applying the property to other purposes,[73] unless the action is barred by some statute of limitations.[74] Nor does a statute which authorizes the members of churches to remove refractory trustees[75] oust the jurisdiction of a court of equity.[76] But to justify the court's interposition, it is necessary to show the creation of a valid trust,[77] the existence of the terms of the trust as alleged,[78] and a real and substantial departure from the purposes thereof,[79] which, in the case of long-continued acquiescence in the present application of trust funds, must be established by proof sufficient to rebut the presumption of legality raised thereby.[80] Where discretion is vested in trustees as to the distribution of a trust fund, or the income thereof, the court will not interfere so long as it is honestly exercised.[81]

[§ 162] (2) Determination of Rights of Contesting Church Factions. Where a dispute between church factions involves only title to office, quo warranto and not an action in equity is the proper remedy,[82] but where the proper use of church property is involved, equity will take jurisdiction and protect the party entitled to possession, regardless of whether it constitutes a majority or minority.[83] As in the case of an alleged diversion by trustees,[84] a substantial departure from the purposes of the trust must be shown before equity will interfere.[85] On proof that proper grounds therefor exist, an equity court will restrain the violation of a charter of the society by a majority of the corporation,[86] enjoin the unauthorized interference with the church property by a faction which refuses to abide by proper adjudications of the duly authorized church tribunals,[87] restrain one of two congregations jointly using a church edifice from introducing a sabbath school into the church without the consent of the other congregation,[88] or decree a division of the property of an independent church organization which is split by irreconcilable differences,[89] but a court of equity will not partition property owned by two religious societies as tenants-in-common, a petition at law for a partition being the proper remedy.[90] Where a religious society holds land in fee, subject to no use except its general purposes, the majority may control the use of it at their pleasure, and no supposed error of doctrine will authorize the interference of a court of equity.[91] In such case, the court will do no more than award the possession of the property to the legal board of trustees in whom the title is vested.[92]

[§ 163] 4. Division, Schism, and Secession—a. Definitions. In a broad sense, division of a religious society means its separation into parts. But the fact always is that either the parts, separating from each other, remain in the society, or one part withdraws, separating itself from the society as effectually as if it had been expelled. When members of the two factions retain their membership in the society, there is said to be either a division or schism. Schism is a separation into parts occasioned by diversity of opinion; division, used in its stricter sense, imports no more than a separation without any change of faith or ulterior relations. Where a part withdraws from the society entirely, reducing its membership ipso facto, the act is called secession.[93]

[§ 164] b. Effect in General. Speaking generally and without regard to particular issues of doctrine and of possible breach of trust or condition involved,[94] the separation or secession of part of the members from a church does not destroy the identity of the church nor lessen the rights of those adhering to the organization,[95] even though the minis-

[b] Removing church to other land is not a breach of trust on which the land was conveyed to the society where the only restriction was that the grantee should not sell the land without the consent of the grantor and where the society was retaining the land for the parsonage. [d] Change of name.—Where deed merely granted land for erection of Episcopal Church, contract between grantor and trustees as individuals, not delivered simultaneously with deed, whereby church was given fixed name, does not prevent change of name on erection of new church building in lieu of that first erected. ter[96] and trustees[97] are among the seceders; but members seceding from a church thereby forfeit all rights to the church property,[98] even though they keep the name of the old society,[99] or even though they incorporate and take its name.[1] However, forcible exclusion is not secession, and members forcibly excluded from the church building and meeting in some other place do not thereby relinquish their rights in the church property,[2] especially where the excluded faction constitute the majority of the church members and still maintain the church organization.[3] A seceding trustee, where he still retains title and right of possession, is trustee for the adherents and must administer the property in their interest.[4] Ministerial land in New England, vested in the minister for the use of the parish or society,[5] remains for what is left of the original parish after its division into separate parishes, and is not in any manner transferred or distributed by the separation,[6] and where, after the division into several parishes, there is a division in the church of the original parish, those remaining with that church are entitled to the property as against those who move away.[7]

[§ 165] c. Identity with Original Society—(1) In General. Where the issue of identity with the original organization is based on grounds other than adherence to and secession from a particular form of doctrine,[8] those who establish such identity by proof are entitled to the property,[9] an estoppel, however, operating against those who stand by without protest while others appropriate a part of the lot and build a church thereon,[10] and neither of the opposing divisions of the original society who later organize themselves into two new and opposing corporations being entitled to the property where there is a failure of proof of identity on the part of both.[11] In cases where identity is determined by adherence to a particular doctrine,[12] a minority claiming to be the original church is not estopped from pressing its claim by participating in worship with the majority where it was led to believe that participation would be without prejudice to its claim.[13]

[§ 166] (2) After Incorporation.[14] The faction first incorporating, provided all members of the church are notified and have opportunity to participate, takes title to the church property,[15] even though it is the minority faction,[16] except that, in the absence of evidence establishing a breach of trust or condition, and under a statute providing that incorporation by a majority of a society only, operates as a transfer of the rights and interests of individual members to the corporation,[17] an incorporation by a minority faction against the wishes of the majority creates merely a new society and has no effect upon individual rights and interests in the old one.[18]

[§ 167] (3) As Affected by Obligation To Adhere to Particular Doctrine. Where the church holds its property or is entitled to its use as a denominational church, the courts, when called upon, will award the property, and all rights pertaining thereto, to those who continue to adhere to the doctrine, tenets, and rules of the church as they existed before the division;[19] even though they constitute only the minority,[20] and even though later they incorporate under a name differing from the original form and the secessionists also incorporate and take over the original name;[21] or in the case of a church subject to the control of denominational judicatories, to those recognized as being the church or congregation by the highest judicatory,[22] acting within its authority,[23] recognition by the highest judicatory prevailing over a contrary recognition by a committee of the judicatory acting without authority.[24] A fortiori, where there is attached to the property an express trust, that certain doctrines shall be taught or a particular form of worship observed, those who adhere to the purpose of the trust are entitled to the property, even though they constitute a minority and the church is independent in government,[25] although it has been held that where the division is made on what constitutes proper denominational doctrine, the majority in an independent church has power to make the controlling declaration and to vote themselves to be the adherents and entitled under the trust,[26] even though a conference or association of churches within the denomination, having no disciplinary power, advises them that they are not.[27] Where the church is independent and self-governing, and where the trust under which the property is held does not require the observance of any particular form of worship or the teaching of any particular doctrine, the control of the property belongs to the majority, regardless of any change of religious views or teachings.[28] Also an independent congregation can act with reference to its property independent of control of the church judicatories, to which it had been subject where, having the right to do so, it had withdrawn from its synodical connections.[29]

[§ 168] d. Powers, Rights and Duties of Trustees and Members after Separation—(1) After Division or Schism—(a) In General. A division or schism within a church, not amounting to secession of a faction, does not operate to deprive either faction of its rights in the church property,[30] and either faction may organize without prejudice to those rights;[31] it must organize before it can maintain an action to enjoin the other faction from alleged interference with the church property,[32] and if it is found to be the faction that is adhering to the faith, it is the church and has the right to control the church property by majority vote of its members, if it has the congregational type of church government.[33] Where, however, a church organization has been divided into two churches by a judicatory having power to make the division, the members of the new church have no property rights in the old.[34] One faction cannot exclude the other on ground of departure from doctrinal beliefs imposed on the church where the difference of opinion between them has nothing to do with doctrinal beliefs,[35] or is based on refined doctrinal distinctions which are not vital or substantial.[36] After a church has divided into factions, one faction may make a binding contract with the other for the purchase of the latter's interest in the church property,[37] and it is not necessary to the validity of such contract that it should be affirmed by a majority of the church members where open conferences were held which all members were allowed to attend and there was no concealment;[38] but at any time before the negotiations for the contract of sale are completed, the church may stop the negotiations and declare against the division and sale by majority vote of its members, where it has a congregational form of church government.[39]

purpose of the trust and none of the members are prevented from participation in its use and enjoyment;[40] and where the church maintains merely voluntary synodical connections, a minority faction is not entitled to a division of the church property against the will of the majority who have changed such connections where both factions still adhere to the constitution of the church,[41] although there is authority favoring the power of a court of equity to make division where the differences between the factions are shown to be irreconcilable.[42] Where the church is subject to the ecclesiastical control of a superior judicatory, it may be divided into two churches on petition of either faction,[43] and where such division is made by a judicatory having authority, a court of equity will then divide the funds and property between them on equitable principles;[44] and it has been held that even where the church is not subject to the ecclesiastical control of a superior judicatory,[45] or where the synodical connections are merely voluntary,[46] a court of equity will divide the property on petition of a faction where the differences between the factions are shown to be irreconcilable and both factions have adhered to the church constitution.[47] The fact that the church is incorporated does not present any obstacle.[48] Where property is owned by several churches in common free from trust obligations and the union of churches is voluntary, a church may withdraw from the union and sue for its share in a partition of the property, where under the statute the rights of all the churches could be protected in the judgment.[49]

[§ 170] bb. By Agreement. Where a division of the property is made by the factions under agreement and no breach of trust is involved, the court will not disturb the arrangement,[50] especially where the factions have acquiesced in the arrangement over a long period of time;[51] but a resolution of a church corporation dividing property of the corporation and setting off to a part of its church membership worshipping at another place cannot operate where there was no grantee, or no individual named as grantee and no corporation to take,[52] and a resolution of a society having a church corporation in its charge which afterwards separated dividing its property between them will not authorize a division of a legacy which had been left to the original church corporation.[53] A division of property in case of schism agreed to by all the members when the congregation was organized will not entitle a faction to a division under the agreement in the absence of evidence that a schism existed.[54]

[§ 171] cc. Under Statute. While it may be that a religious corporation may be able under special legislative authority to divide its property between congregations worshipping at different places in church buildings belonging to the corporation under circumstances where without such authority it could not do so,[55] the legislature has no power by special act to divide a religious society and against its protest to give a part of the funds and property of the old society to the new society created thereby.[56] In some states, statutes, held not to apply in case of secession of a faction,[57] expressly provide that in case of division or schism, the trustees shall permit each of the factions to have the use of the house of worship proportionately to the number belonging to each faction.[58] Where each of two factions in an independent, self-governing congregation claims to be the majority, there is a division within the meaning of the statute, and either faction is entitled to have the use of the church apportioned,[59] and the church records copied at the expense of both factions, each faction receiving a copy.[60] Upon proof that the separation is a division or schism and not an expulsion of one faction by the other on proper grounds, the faction alleged to have been expelled is entitled to a use of the church-house under the terms of the statute;[61] and where the statute excepts from its operation and benefits a faction excommunicated by the other on charges of immorality brought in good faith and established by proof,[62] a charge of immorality against a single member of a faction will not justify the exclusion of the faction from the benefits of the statute.[63] Under the decisions, however, the statute has been very much restricted in its application. It applies only to trustees who have the legal title and the control of the church property,[64] and only for the period of time during which a decision is pending as to which faction is the church and entitled to the full control of its property.[65] In churches having a congregational type of government, a vote of the majority decides this question, and from that time on the majority faction is entitled to the use of the church exclusively,[66] except in cases where the issue between the factions does not affect the status of the minority faction as a part of the church organization.[67]

The statute has been still further restricted to cases where the original trustees having died, new trustees are appointed under other provisions of the statute.[68] In other states, the statute providing for apportionment of the use of a church building,[69] applies only where the church building is occupied by two societies of different denominations and only when the petitioning society owns at least five pews therein.[70]

[§ 172] (2) After Secession. While seceding members may have forfeited all right to the church property,[71] they are entitled to reimbursement for necessary repairs to the church made by them in good faith while in possession.[72] It has been held that they are not liable for rent for the period of occupation while the issue of whether they or the opposing faction were entitled to possession was being litigated.[73] Payment by them of the debts of the church from which they withdrew does not give secessionists an interest in the property entitling them to a partition.[74] Where there has been a secession, those seceding are not entitled to the benefit of the statute providing for the use of the church property by both parties where there has been a division or schism.[75] Even where they form a new society and enter into an arrangement for the use of the church building by the new society, such contract rights as they may have lapse with its dissolution.[76]

[§ 173] C. Actions To Determine Rights to Property—1. Remedies and Defenses. Following the rules applicable to the jurisdiction of courts of equity,[77] an action may be brought in equity to secure the enforcement of a trust for religious purposes and to prevent a departure from the designated faith or doctrine in contravention thereof;[78] or to restrain a threatened interference with worship or church management in accordance with the designated faith and doctrine,[79] unless the property is held free of any trust, express or implied;[80] or to secure an adjudication as to the rights of contending parties to the use of the church property;[81] or to make a division between them in case of schism;[82] or to secure the specific performance of a contract of sale of land to the society,[83] or a reconveyance of church property to trustees of an unincorporated society by a corporation secretly and fraudulently organized to take over the property;[84] or, under statutory authority, to declare a church extinct and to decree the disposition of its property.[85] Also an action in equity is the proper remedy against an unincorporated religious society whose property is held in common and whose members are numerous and constantly changing.[86] An action at law may be brought for the recovery of the possession of the property.[87] Ejectment is a proper method by which to determine the right to possession of church property as between parties claiming to be trustees of the church,[88] or persons claiming under them.[89] Under a statute providing for the disposition of the property of extinct churches,[90] ejectment by a general conference to recover the property of an extinct church cannot be maintained until the question whether or not it is extinct has been adjudicated.[91] So also where the petition combines a cause of action in ejectment and a cause of action to impose a trust on property for the use of the petitioners, an adjudication of their title under the alleged trust is a condition precedent to the maintenance of the action in ejectment.[92]

Defenses. Delay in bringing a petition for equitable relief, amounting to laches, is a defense to the action.[93] The fact that the only trespass is a past act and that no continuance of the trespass is threatened is a defense to an action for an injunction against interference with church services.[94] Noncompliance of a decision of a church judicatory with the by-law of the church is a defense to an action for relief based on such decision.[95] Illegality of the relief sought or the purpose of the petitioners to circumvent the law or a court decree enforcing it thereby is a defense.[96] Rescission of a contract for the sale of church property by one faction to another before any deed had been signed in pursuance thereof is a defense to an action brought for its specific performance.[97] It is not a defense to an action brought by a Roman catholic bishop against a suspended priest to recover possession of the church property that the bishop did not own the land on which the church was built.[98]

[§ 174] 2. Jurisdiction. It is well settled that, while civil courts will not interfere in purely ecclesiastical matters,[99] they will take jurisdiction of and determine controverted claims to the title, use or possession of church property,[1] subject to any statutory restrictions which may exist on the jurisdiction of particular courts;[2] but the mere fact that property rights are involved will not give the court jurisdiction where the real question at issue is one of religious doctrine.[3] Where the rights to church property are dependent upon the rules and discipline of the church or denomination, together with the decisions of the church tribunals, the civil courts will give effect to such rules and decisions,[4] when not inconsistent with the constitution and laws of the state,[5] and will inquire only as to what are the rules and decisions of the church and its tribunals, and what parties or factions adhere to them, without questioning their wisdom or propriety.[6] Under a statute giving the court authority to declare societies that have been or shall be affiliated with a particular denominational conference extinct and to decree the disposition of their property,[7] the court has no authority to declare extinct a society which was extinct before the conference itself had come into existence.[8]

[§ 175] 3. Persons Entitled To Sue, and Parties. Actions involving the title or control of church property are properly brought in the name of the church, if incorporated,[9] or having the status of a quasi corporation,[10] and must be brought in its name and not in the names of the trustees when the church and not the trustees is the incorporated body.[11] So also in a suit to determine property rights between two incorporated church organizations, action should be brought against the corporation and not its members.[12] Trustees, duly authorized to represent the corporation,[13] are the persons prima facie entitled to institute the litigation,[14] and the action is properly brought in their names when the title of the property,[15] or of a moiety thereof,[16] is vested in them in trust.[17] The dissent of one of two trustees does not invalidate an action brought in the name of both where the dissenting trustee has been indemnified for the costs.[18] In general no right to sue in behalf of the church or society is vested in officers of the church other than the trustees,[19] as, for example, in the minister,[20] or the session of the presbyterian church,[21] or in a bishop of the Roman catholic church,[22] or in the members,[23] in the absence of a demand made upon the officers authorized to act to do so, or of a showing that such demand would be unavailing.[24] But where the trustees of the corporation refuse to bring suit,[25] or where the trustees or other officers are charged with a diversion of the trust property,[26] any member of the corporation for himself and in behalf of others may join as plaintiffs in an action brought in the name of the corporation. A separate and independent body within the church which has unlimited control of particular funds has been held to have capacity of suing and being sued with reference thereto,[27] and where under the church constitution a superior church judicatory is given control over the church property, the judicatory is entitled to maintain an action with reference thereto,[28] and the officers of a general church organization, as representative of the general membership, may maintain a suit in equity to determine property rights,[29] or where the issue raised in the suit is between trustees and particular officers, such officers are properly made parties.[30] Trustees are necessary parties to an action brought to test the constitutionality of a statute under which they claim authority to dispose of a fund belonging to the corporation for other than corporate purposes.[31] When the society is unincorporated, suit may be brought by the trustees,[32] or by one or more members of the society in behalf of all,[33] or by pewholders having and retaining an interest in the church property,[34] without including officers or members of the governing body.[35] But the rule allowing members of an unincorporated society to bring action for themselves and in behalf of other members of the society,[36] has been held under a statute to apply only to actions in equity, and not to be applicable to an action of trover.[37] A suit to prevent a diversion of trust funds may be brought by contributors to such funds,[38] suing in behalf of themselves and other contributors to such funds,[39] it not being necessary that all should be joined as parties to the suit.[40] But where the action is based on a contract, it must be brought either by persons who are subscribers thereto or by the successors or legal representatives of the society for whose benefit the contract was made.[41] A nonmember of the church or society cannot maintain an action to regulate the use of the church property,[42] even though he was one of the original grantors,[43] or was formerly a member of the society.[44] The town or selectmen are not necessary or proper parties to actions involving rights to church property after the parochial affairs of the town have been taken over by an organized parish.[45]

[§ 176] 4. Pleading. A complaint or petition which sets up facts showing the right of plaintiff to sue and to maintain or recover the possession and control of the property in question, together with facts showing the wrongful possession or diversion of defendants, is sufficient.[46] A petition for relief brought by members of an independent church having a congregational type of government which does not show that plaintiffs and those for whom they act constitute a majority of the membership is insufficient.[47] A petition by one religious corporation against another in an action brought to determine property rights based on forms of faith is not sufficient where it contains no allegations as to church polity.[48] A petition is insufficient to state a cause of action against a particular defendant where it fails to show any interest of his in the property,[49] or any interest of the petitioner,[50] or any invasion of his property rights.[51] Where the title to the property is admitted to be in third persons, a petition praying that plaintiffs be put in possession and that defendants be restrained from interfering therewith is one for an injunction, and not in ejectment.[52] Under a statute so providing,[53] defendants cannot set up in their answers that plaintiff trustees are holding the church property in violation of their trust until they have tried out the issue of title in an independent action.[54]

[§ 177] 5. Evidence. Presumptions and burden of proof. There is a presumption that congregations conduct themselves in an orderly manner and according to the rules and usages of deliberative bodies.[55] The burden of proving a better right to the property in question is on defendants where plaintiffs are members or trustees adhering to the established organization,[56] but it is on plaintiffs where defendants have been adjudged the duly elected trustees.[57] The burden of proving secession,[58] or diversion of trust property,[59] or lack of authority to mortgage church property,[60] or existence of condition upon which claim of reverter of church property to grantor is based,[61] is on the party alleging it.[62]

Admissibility. It is error to exclude evidence which bears directly on the issues of the case and is otherwise unobjectionable;[63] but irrelevant and immaterial evidence, such as the adherence of members to certain doctrines when that question is not in issue, should be excluded.[64] Records of an ex

[c] Expulsion sufficiently alleged.—An allegation in a bill to restrain the use of certain property, against certain expelled members of a religious society, that they were expelled after full and mature deliberation by the church, is sufficient, as it shows the expulsion to have been made by the church, and it will be presumed that everything necessary and proper was done. [a] Constitution and by-laws.—A document identified by members of an incorporated religious society as the constitution and by-laws used by the society is admissible in a suit to determine rights to property claimed by contending factions, although no vote of the society, adopting it as such, is shown. Baker v. Ducker, 79 Cal. 365, 21 P 764.

[a] List of minority faction.—On an issue as to how the members voted at a church meeting which parte proceeding by a church judicatory having no jurisdiction are not admissible.[65]

Weight and sufficiency. On a question of change or departure from faith, detached sentences from the sermon of the minister should not be given too much weight,[66] and the opinion of an elder should not be allowed to overweigh the decision of several ecclesiastical tribunals.[67] A finding of title in plaintiff is justified by evidence showing the acquisition of title by adverse possession.[68] A decree in favor of a minority faction of an independent church is not justified in the absence of evidence that the majority faction had renounced the faith.[69] The use of ribald, coarse and scurrilous language by a pastor with reference to a mission board and college supported by the church is not in itself sufficient to show a diversion of property.[70] A valid appointment of a church officer is not shown by an appointment which fails to conform to the church discipline.[71]

[§ 178] 6. Questions of Law and Fact. What constitutes secession is a question of law for the court.[72] Whether in a particular case there has been a secession,[73] or which faction were the adherents and which faction the secessionists,[74] is a mixed question of law and fact. Where no departure from church doctrines is claimed and the only issue is which faction had a majority of the church members, the question is one of fact.[75] It is for the court to determine whether a certain meeting of the church was a legal one.[76] It is for the jury to determine whether plaintiffs are the duly elected trustees so as to be entitled to sue, when that question is raised by answer and not by demurrer.[77]

[§ 179] 7. Argument and Instructions to Jury. In his argument to the jury, counsel may read extracts from the writings of a person learned in theology which are merely argumentative, but not extracts from opinions of scientific witnesses which would be inadmissible as evidence.[78] The failure of the court to name all plaintiffs and defendants in his charge to the jury does not constitute prejudicial error.[79] The refusal of the court to submit issues of fact to the jury is not error where the only issue in the case is on an ecclesiastical question on which there had been an adjudication by an ecclesiastical tribunal and an opportunity for review by another church tribunal exists.[80]

[§ 180] 8. Judgment, Relief, and Costs.[81] Where relief is sought under a particular statute, the parties are limited to the statutory relief,[82] and to the restrictions and conditions imposed by statute on the granting of it.[83] On the other hand they can receive no aid from the statute if they do not base their claim upon it.[84] Subject to the qualifications already noted,[85] the court will, in general, grant such relief to either or both parties, as the circumstances of the case requires,[86] as, for example, restoration of possession of church property to those entitled and their protection from further interference,[87] or an accounting by a church pastor of funds of the church held by him,[88] subject to his right to apply the same on mortgage notes of the church which he holds.[89] The court will not make a decree as to disposition of property in violation of the trust to which the property is subject,[90] nor will it make an order against trustees based on breach of trust in the absence of evidence of such breach,[91] but it will order the church property sold and proceeds divided among the church members where it appears that the church is about equally divided by irreconcilable differences,[92] and it will make an order restraining officers of an independent church from making a sale where the evidence shows that the sale had not been consented to by a majority of the congregation.[93] It is proper for the court to order that rival factions shall alternate in the use and possession of the church, pending the decision of the question of their rights by the church tribunals where neither faction is in possession to the exclusion of the other.[94] A decree authorizing a faction to occupy the church for a part of the time for purposes of worship is not a grant of power to place its own elected pastor and officers in authority over the entire church membership.[95] In the absence of agreement between them dividing the use of the church building and one faction being in possession to the exclusion of the other, the court cannot compel it to divide its possession with the other, pending an adjudication by the civil court of the right to possession.[96] But the court will not allow to a faction which has obtained a decree establishing its right to the possession of the church property compensation to be paid by the unsuccessful faction for use and occupation pending the trial where no member of the church of either faction was excluded from worshipping at the church.[97] A judgment against the trustees will not bind the real estate, or the proceeds of a sale thereof, where the statutes from which they derive their authority confer no power upon them to alien or encumber the real estate of their own volition.[98] An order directing delivery of church property to members of a congregation means a delivery to them as representatives of the church.[99] An order requiring the delivery of deeds to church property into the physical possession of the receiver and the execution of such other deeds as might thereafter be required is not an adjudication of title to such property.[1] Where the relief involves the adjustment of accounts between two religious corporations, it will be brought, in point of time, down to the close of the litigation.[2]

Costs. It has been held that a parish for whose benefit a suit is defended ought to defray the expenses of the suit,[3] and that a trustee who has wrongfully refused to execute his trust is properly charged with the costs of the proceeding brought to compel him to do so.[4]

IX. PEWS

[§ 181] A. Estate, Interest, and Rights of Pewholder—1. General Rules. A pew[5] is not absolute but qualified and conditional property,[6] upon which a grant in perpetuity operates merely as a conveyance of the right to sit therein.[7] In some states it is regarded as realty,[8] but notes for rent thereof are personalty;[9] in others, as personalty.[10] It is in the nature of a mere usufruct,[11] or incorporeal immovable.[12] The pewholder has no title to the soil on which the edifice stands, nor to the edifice itself,[13] but merely an easement therein,[14] the edifice being the property of the society,[15] of which the seisin and possession are in the trustees.[16] Nor does the pewholder own the space above the pew;[17] he has merely a right to use the pew, subject to and limited by the rights and powers of the corporation or trustees and all the conditions and limitations incident to such property, and subject to the superior title included in the ownership of the house.[18] His right is limited to an exclusive occupancy of a certain part of the meeting-house for the purpose of attending upon public worship, during the time that the church is open for church purposes,[19] amounting in the case of a free church, where there is no renting of pews, merely to a license to occupy a seat therein.[20] The pewholder's right to occupancy is subject to the right of the society to have the meeting-house in such a place as will best accommodate the whole.[21] This right to occupy may be held by a corporation.[22] The pewholder cannot remove the pew,[23] nor convert it to other use, and can do nothing which may interfere with or impair the use of the building for the purpose for which it is used.[24] He cannot change it,[25] or decorate it to his fancy,[26] or cut it down and carry it away.[27] The right is limited also as to time, for if the house is burnt or destroyed by time the right is gone;[28] but the right extends so long as the pew remains or to the limit of the term of purchase,[29] and the pew owner cannot be despoiled of his property, and in some respects his rights are superior to those of the church, and they must exercise their general ownership in subordination to them, and be restricted to the general purposes for which the church was created.[30] Withdrawal of the hand of fellowship has no effect on the pewholder's right to attend divine service or to a seat in the edifice.[31] The pewholder's right to his pew is not affected by a sale of the building to another church of the same denomination although the church membership and right to vote in the old society which the ownership of his pew gave him may not have been carried over into the new society.[32]

[§ 182] 2. Alteration, Removal, or Destruction of Pew or Church Edifice, and Compensation for Pew. The church society may pull down and rebuild the meeting-house, make repairs, alterations, and improvements, and determine when it shall give place to a new one,[33] or may remodel the pew and alter the internal structure of the building, or enlarge or remove it, or sell or abandon the edifice and rebuild elsewhere;[34] and when these changes are necessary,[35] or when the meeting-house has become so old, decayed, or ruinous as to be unfit for use, and when in fact the pew has ceased to be of any use or value as a pew, and the pew is removed, the title is gone,[36] and its owner is not entitled to compensation.[37] Nor can a pewholder recover for a temporary interruption for necessary repairs.[38] Nor can he recover possession of a pew formerly occupied but which has been removed during alterations.[39] A pewholder is entitled to compensation for destruction of his pew if it is maliciously done by the society or by a majority of its members,[40] or if it is done, not from necessity,[41] but for a merely useful or convenient purpose.[42] Under circumstances justifying removal without compensation,[43] the materials may be worked into a new house or may be sold and the proceeds put into the treasury to aid in rebuilding, and the individual pewholders cannot claim a share in the materials or proceeds.[44] But it has been held that where a religious edifice is sold, and a new one erected with the proceeds, it is the duty of the trustees to tender to a pewholder a pew in the new edifice corresponding in location to that which he owned in the old building, on the payment of such a sum as, in equity, he ought to pay, if the cost of the new structure exceeds the proceeds of the sale of the old property, together with the sums in the treasury of the society, and if they fail to allot him a pew he is entitled to damages for his loss;[45] and where, with the assent of a religious society owning a meeting-house, repairs and alterations changing the location of the pews are made by the pewholders, an equitable assignment of the new pews among the pewholders by a committee of the pewholders, acting with their implied assent and in pursuance of a vote of the society, is valid.[46] The action of church trustees in making repairs interfering with or destroying pews is presumed to accord with the wishes of a majority of the society.[47]

[§ 183] B. Renting, Assignment, and Conveyance. Religious societies may make such reasonable by-laws and regulations respecting the renting,[48] sale and purchase of pews as they think their interests as a religious society may require,[49] so as to exclude persons holding obnoxious opinions, and thus prevent a change in the society by an influx of persons of a different faith,[50] and the doctrine that conditions against alienation in a conveyance in fee simple are void has never been held applicable to

"It is competent for such a society to make such reasonable by-laws and regulations, respecting the sale and purchase of pews, as they think their interests as a religious society may require. And it is usual for such societies to make such regulations in regard to the sale of their pews, and express them in the deeds they issue, as to prevent an indiscriminate sale of pews, and thus retain some right to elect and determine whom they will associate with, or rather who may associate with them. Otherwise, if it were free to anybody to purchase pews without restraint, a number of people of another denomination, finding pews low, might purchase them and become a majority, and thus turn the proper congregation out of their own house." Atty-Gen. v. Federal St. Meeting-House, supra.

[a] A conveyance to a non-member is void where a by-law of the society prohibits sales of pews to nonmembers. Price v. Lyon, 14 Conn. 279.

[b] In England.—(1) The assignment and tenure of pews was discussed at length in Livingston v. Trenton Trinity Church, 45 N. J. L. 230. (2) As is there shown, before the Reformation, no separate seats were allowed in churches, the body of the church being common to all parishioners; but after the Reformation a practice arose to assign particular seats to individuals, and this assignment of seats was made by the bishop or ordinary, by a grant called a faculty which was a mere license, and was personal to the licensee; and all disputes concerning it were determined in the spiritual courts. Newark Third Presb. Cong. v. Andruss, 21 N. J. L. 325; 1 Burn Eccl. L. p 358. (3) The disposal of seats in the nave of the church appertained to common right to the bishop of the diocese, "so that he may place and displace whomsoever he pleaseth" (Boothly v. Baily, Hob. 69, 80 Reprint 218; 1 Burn Eccl. L. p 359; Comyns Dig. tit Eglise 3), (4) and the ordering of it was a matter merely spiritual (Corven's Case, 12 Coke 105, 77 Reprint 1380; Hool Church D. tit Pews). (5) The discretionary power of ordering the seats in the church which, by the common law, was vested in the ordinary, by custom was exercised by the churchwardens, who were the representatives of the ordinary in that respect, and whose assignment of seats was presumed to have been made with the approbation and consent of the ordinary. 2 Bacon Abr. p 242; 1 Burn Eccl. p 359; Wood Inst. pp 88, 90. (6) Consequently it has become the settled law of the English courts that churchwardens have a discretionary power to appropriate the pews in the church, subject only to the control of the ordinary. Reynolds v. Monkton, 2 M. & R. 384; Re St. Columb Cathedral Church, 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 861. (7) In England the right to a pew can be acquired only by a faculty, which is personal to the grantee, and cannot of itself be given a transmissible or heritable quality (Stocks v. Booth, 1 T. R. 428, 99 Reprint 1177; Clifford v. Wicks, 1 B. & Ald. 498, 106 Reprint 83), (8) or by prescription, which will not arise from a possession, however long, unless it be annexed to a house, and it also be shown that the pew was repaired by the claimant and those under whom he claims for the prescriptive period (Boothly v. Baily, Hob. 69, 80 Reprint 218; Stocks v. Booth, 1 T. R. 428, 99 Reprint 1177), (9) or by a grant which, creating an incorporeal interest in lands, must be in writing and under seal; or by a letting for a limited period by the proper authorities of the church (Livingston v. Trenton Trinity Church, 45 N. J. L. 230), (10) and in an action for disturbance in the enjoyment of the right, plaintiff must prove a prescriptive right or a faculty and must claim it in the declaration as appurtenant to a messuage in the parish (Brumfitt v. Roberts, L. R. 5 C. P. 232; Mainwaring v. Giles, 5 B. & Ald. 356, 7 ECL 198, 106 Reprint 1221; Stocks v. Booth, 1 T. R. 428, 99 Reprint 1177) (11) for the grant of a pew to any person without regard to a messuage or inhabitancy within the parish is void by the general law (Mainwaring v. Giles, 5 B. & Ald. 356, 7 ECL 198, 106 Reprint 1221; Stocks v. Booth, 1 T. R. 428, 99 Reprint 1177; Brumfitt v. Roberts, L. R. 5 C. P. 232), (12) and it is only a legal right of possession acquired by some one of these methods that can be made the foundation of legal proceedings for its protection in a court of law; otherwise, the disturbance of the possession is a matter of ecclesiastical cognizance only (Mainwaring v. Giles, 5 B. & Ald. 356, 7 ECL 198, 106 Reprint 1221; Stocks v. Booth, 1 T. R. 428, 99 Reprint 1177). (13) The English ecclesiastical law governing pew rights forms the basis of the law regulating the affairs of the episcopal church in this country, and is in force except so far as it has been modified and changed by statute and by the usages and canons of the church. Livingston v. Trenton Trinity Church, 45 N. J. L. 230; Lynd v. Menzies, 33 N. J. L. 162.

conveyance of pews.[51] Where a pew is considered real estate,[52] an instrument conveying it must have the solemnities required by law for the transfer of real estate by deed,[53] and a contract for the sale of a pew stipulating for "a good and sufficient deed" is not performed by the offer of a perpetual lease, reserving rent,[54] even though under the constitution of the church conveyances of pews were restricted to that form.[55] The levy of an execution upon a pew as real estate will transfer a title which at law will prevail over a prior assignment of a certificate of the ownership of it of which the execution creditor was ignorant.[56] Where the charter of a church declared that the purchasers of pews in fee simple shall hold them forever, free from any liability for debts, and that they shall never be susceptible of any species of mortgage, the pews are a distinct property, and when owned by an individual are not liable to be seized for his debts.[57]

[§ 184] C. Taxes, Rents, and Forfeitures—1. In General. Where no mode of taxation is prescribed by the act of incorporation, a religious society may adopt any mode which is not prohibited by law, and may, with the assent of all the proprietors, tax the pews in the meeting-house and regulate the proceedings therefor by its by-laws,[58] and may let or sell the pews in the meeting-house on condition that the lessee or grantee should pay a certain sum yearly or such taxes as may be lawfully assessed thereon,[59] and that he should forfeit his right in the pew on failure to pay.[60] Or it may sell pews free of rent, in which case the pewholder is under no obligation to pay an assessment,[61] unless a binding promise to pay is proved.[62] But where the constitution of the society regulates the matter in order to justify the sale of a pew for non-payment of an assessment laid by the society owning the church, it is requisite that the assessment and forfeiture or sale be in conformity with the provisions of the constitution and by-laws of the society,[63] a forfeiture for nonpayment not resulting in the absence of express provision in the constitution therefor.[64] The obligation of the pewholder to pay is not affected by his institution of proceedings for the purchase of his pew by the society under the statute where later such proceedings were abandoned and the pewholder retained his rights to his pew.[65] Executors of a pewholder are not bound to pay pew rent accruing after his death.[66]

[§ 185] 2. Limitation of Power To Tax. The purposes for which an assessment on pews may legally be made may be restricted by the terms of a statute or deed.[67] A statute which gives power to incorporated religious societies to tax pewholders for specifically enumerated purposes inferentially denies that power for purposes not enumerated,[68] and a later statute which widens the power to include the purposes not enumerated under the earlier statute but restricting its application to meeting-houses thereafter erected has no application to a meeting-house in existence at the time of the enactment,[69] and a still later statute extending the application of the second statute to churches in existence at the time of its enactment has no application to a church not complying with the conditions stipulated therein.[70] A tax assessed upon a pew by a religious corporation in part for purposes not specifically named in a deed of the pew, which alone gives the power to make such assessment, and which strictly defines and limits such power, is invalid in toto;[71] but where under the deed, granted when the society was unincorporated, the power to tax is unlimited, the pewholder cannot object if a charter power later granted in restricted terms is subsequently enlarged by statute, where the legislative power to alter, amend or repeal the charter had been reserved.[72]

[§ 186] D. Actions To Enforce Pewholder's Rights and Liabilities—1. In General. A pewholder has an exclusive right to an undisturbed occupancy of his pew,[73] and he can maintain trespass, ejectment or a writ of entry, or an action on the case against any one who improperly disturbs him in the legitimate exercise of his legal right to use the pew during divine service,[74] even against the society or person in whom the title to the land and building is vested,[75] and although others may have so far obtained possession of a meeting-house as to oust the society, yet a pewholder may maintain trespass for the first invasion of his individual right to his pew after such ouster;[76] but trespass will not lie for a destruction of a pew by pulling down the meeting-house, in order to rebuild it by order of the parish;[77] and a pewholder cannot maintain trespass for the mere breaking and entry of the meeting-house in which his pew is situate; but he may for the destruction of his pew, although he sue for the entry with it, the destruction of the pew being the gist of the action;[78] and a collector who makes a sale of a pew under an unauthorized assessment for repairs is jointly liable in an action of case with the purchaser under the sale who alone actually disturbs the owner, both being principals.[79] In an action of assumpsit by the society to recover the price of a pew from a purchaser at an auction sale, it is not necessary that the society should offer evidence of its right and title to the pew.[80]

[51] French v. Old South Soc., 106 Mass. 479 (holding also that a condition prescribed by a by-law in the deeds of pews by an incorporated religious society, which owns its meeting-house in fee simple, and is composed exclusively of the successive pewholders, that the grantee shall forfeit the pew if he leave the meeting-house without first offering it to the society for a certain price, is not invalid as being repugnant to the grant).

[a] Assent of majority to tax.—A pewholder in a church whose deed from the society before it was incorporated expressly subjected his pew to all rates and taxes imposed thereon by the trustees for expenses and repairs cannot object to the repeal, without his assent, of a clause in the charter subsequently obtained, which requires the assent of a majority of the pewholders to the imposition by the trustees of any pew tax, where the general assembly have expressly reserved to themselves the power in the charter to alter, amend, or repeal it at pleasure. [a] Destruction of pews.—Where subscribers for the erection of a Roman catholic church contracted for the purchase of a site, but no grantee was named, and after the edifice was erected, and the pews allotted, the land was conveyed to the bishop of the diocese, he holds the legal title as

Injunction. Equity may restrain a school district from converting a meeting-house into a schoolhouse,[81] and it will enjoin an illegal sale of a pew under an attachment where it appears that the pewholder's religious feelings would be outraged and that he could have no adequate remedy at law.[82] But it will not enjoin the pulling down, rebuilding, or alteration of a church building where necessary, there being an adequate remedy at law.[83] It will not enjoin the trustees from removing and changing the pews of the church where a statute expressly gives them power to regulate and order the renting of pews,[84] nor will it enjoin the trustees selling the pew for failure of the holder to pay his assessment.[85]

Certiorari. The control of church officials over the pews of a church being discretionary, certiorari will not lie to review their action in relation thereto, in the absence of any contract between the church and pewholder for the occupation of his pew.[86]

[§ 187] 2. Defenses. In an action by a pewholder to recover for the unnecessary destruction of his pew, tender by the society of its value,[87] or acceptance by the pewholder of a new pew at a higher price is a defense.[88] But in an action by the pewholder against a stranger for trespass, it is no defense that the church had failed to keep the house in repair and that the pewholder's right was of no value.[89] In an action on a note given in consideration of a sale of pews to defendant followed by possession, it is no defense that the vendor refused to convey,[90] or that the society had been ousted from the meeting-house by the holder of a paramount title where the ouster occurred some time after the pewholder had gone into occupation of his pew.[91] In an action by a pewholder to recover his pew, title by levy of execution on the pew is no defense where the execution is not recorded on the parish books as required by statute.[92] In an action to enforce liability of a pewholder for assessment made upon his pew, it is no defense that the society had changed its name where it appeared that the pewholder had accepted a deed of the pew conditioned on his paying the annual assessment.[93] In an action to enforce a forfeiture for breach of condition on which a pew was held, waiver by the society of its right to declare a forfeiture is not established by its taxing the pewholder for a period of years after the breach, the breach being continuous.[94]

[§ 188] 3. Persons Entitled To Sue. Government officers entitled to the occupancy of pews owned by the Crown may bring an action against the churchwardens for wrongful interference with their rights.[95] One who occupies a loose seat or bench in a place assigned it by the trustees does not have the seizin or possession of a pewholder entitling him to maintain trespass for breaking and entering his close.[96] A tenant in common with others of a meeting-house may maintain trespass for injuring one of the pews against one having no title or right either in the pew or in the house.[97]

X. CHURCH TRIBUNALS AND JUDICIAL OR LEGISLATIVE SUPERVISION

[§ 189] A. General Principles—1. Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction of Church Tribunals. When a person becomes a member of a church, he thereby submits to the ecclesiastical jurisdiction in ecclesiastical matters and he has no legal right to invoke the supervisory power of a civil court so long as none of his civil rights are involved.[98] Nor is a civil right involved in excommunication or excision of a member

"The right to organize voluntary religious associations to assist in the expression and dissemination of any religious doctrine, and to create tribunals for the decision of controverted questions of faith within the association, and for the ecclesiastical government of all the individual members, congregations, and having the same effect in proceedings before a civil court as the judgment of any civil court of competent jurisdiction,[4] regardless of whether the governing authority is placed in one person or in a synod or conference,[5] or whether the mode of procedure is in accord with the ordinary course of investigations or trials.[6] There is some authority to the contrary.[7] It has been held, however, that constitutional questions affecting the organization and authority of the tribunal, and whether its decision violates the constitution of the church, may be reviewed by the civil courts.[8]

[§ 190] 2. Jurisdiction and Power of Civil Courts. While ecclesiastical tribunals have exclusive jurisdiction of ecclesiastical matters,[9] civil rights are within the exclusive jurisdiction of the courts.[10] But civil courts have no jurisdiction over the church or its members, as such, or over its officers or tribunals, except where temporal rights are involved;[11] nor in court proceedings can they inquire or decide officers within the general association, is unquestioned. All who unite themselves to such a body do so with an implied consent to this government, and are bound to submit to it. But it would be a vain consent and would lead to the total subversion of such religious bodies, if any one aggrieved by one of their decisions could appeal to the secular courts and have them reversed. It is of the essence of these religious unions, and of their right to establish tribunals for the decision of questions arising among themselves, that those decisions should be binding in all cases of ecclesiastical cognizance, subject only to such appeals as the organism itself provides for." Watson v. Jones, 13 Wall. (U. S.) 679, 728, 20 L. ed. 666.

[a] Union between religious bodies.—Where, according to the book of discipline of the methodist episcopal church, as construed by its bishops and its ecclesiastical authorities, the bishop who presides at the annual conference has the power to consolidate two or more churches into one church, and the trustees of the church thereby become in the law of the church the successors of the trustees of the churches whose existences were terminated, and such construction is the common understanding and practice of the church, and has never been called in question, it is binding on the courts. Trinity M. E. Church v. Harris, 73 Conn. 216, 47 A 116, 50 LRA 636; Clark v. Brown, (Civ. A.) 108 SW 421 [rev on other grounds 102 Tex. 323, 116 SW 360, 24 LRANS 670].

[b] Division of church into two.—The division of a local presbyterian church into two organizations by the act of a presbytery, according to the recognized ecclesiastical law of the presbyterian church, is binding upon the local church, and upon the civil courts whenever material to pending litigation. Wheelock v. Los Angeles First Presb. Church, 119 Cal. 477, 51 P 841.

[c] Secession.—Where a presbytery decides that members of a presbyterian church have seceded, the decision binds the civil courts and the seceders, although a majority lose their rights to the church property. "In this State the case is wholly different [from England]. We have no religious establishment, no ecclesiastical law, or courts, established by any authority. All their laws are wanting in this essential requisite, to give them any authority, that they are not 'prescribed by the supreme power in a State.' And though they may form constitutions, enact canons, laws, or ordinances, establish courts, or make any decisions, decrees of judgments, yet they can have only a voluntary obedience, cannot affect any civil rights, immunities, or contracts, or alter or dissolve any relations, or obligations, arising from contracts. When their proceedings are to be examined by ordinary tribunals of justice, their power is a phantom, and they can receive no other consideration, than the regulations of any other voluntary associations, formed for trifling, or grave and important, purposes. Obedience to the requisitions of any ecclesiastical societies may be required, under the penalty of spiritual censures; but this is the only penalty incurred by disobedience; and whether one submits to, or defies, the proceedings of any ecclesiastical court, or any censures passed by them, depends on his conviction of the regularity, or irregularity, of their proceedings. In short, they can only affect the conscience of the individual; how far they affect this, he must be the judge." Smith v. Nelson, supra.

[b] Courts will not compel individual to attend worship in any place, nor remain connected with any church, nor to receive any one as his pastor. Feizel v. Wyandotte City M. E. Church First German Soc., 9 Kan. 592.

[c] Courts of equity (1) will not supplement the rules of a church by supplying a remedy for the regulation of purely church affairs (Powers v. Budy, 45 Nebr. 208, 63 NW 476), (2) and will not review the decisions or proceedings of ecclesiastical judicatures in matters properly within their province under the laws and regulations of the church (Travers v. Abbey, 104 Tenn. 665, 58 SW 247, 51 LRA 260 [holding also that there is no waiver of the jurisdiction of a religious society to adjudicate its own matters by answering and setting up a defense in a court of equity, since the jurisdiction is of the subject matter, and objection may be raised at any time]) (3) and, where no property rights are involved, will not interfere to quell religious disturbances (Papailiou v. Manusos, 108 Ill. A. 272), (4) and thus a bill to enjoin proceedings of an ecclesiastical body which fails to show that property rights will be affected thereby is demurrable (Fussell v. Hail, 233 Ill. 73, 84 NE 42 [aff 134 Ill. A. 620]). (5) But it has been held that a court of equity may interfere in an ecclesiastical controversy so far as to ascertain if the governing body has acted within the scope of its authority. Batterson v. Thompson, 8 Phila. (Pa.) 251.

[d] Questions of procedure; certiorari.—Irregularity under the canons of the church in the organization of the diocesan court and refusal of such court to entertain a challenge by a clergyman on trial before it to one of the members of the court, and what religious doctrines are true or what are false except where property rights or the administration of a trust are involved.[12] Where a civil right or the right of property depends upon some ecclesiastical matter, such as doctrine, discipline, or church government, the civil court, where the question may arise, will take the ecclesiastical decisions, out of which the civil right has arisen, as it finds them, accepting those decisions as matters adjudicated by another jurisdiction;[13] and until an ecclesiastical tribunal having final jurisdiction to decide the question has determined it, the civil court will not assume to do so.[14] It has been held, however, that constitutional questions affecting the organization and authority of the church tribunal,[15] and whether its decision violates the constitution of the church, may be reviewed by the civil courts[16] unless the precise question has itself been adjudicated by the supreme tribunal of the church having jurisdiction thereof.[17] If, however, the authority of the church tribunal is doubtful, the court will be slow to inter-supposed insufficiency of the evidence upon which accused could be convicted under the provisions of a certain canon, are questions of procedure where they involve construction of the canons of the church, and depend upon the judgment of the ecclesiastical court over which the civil court can exercise no power of revision, or control. There is no power or jurisdiction in the civil courts of common-law jurisdiction to review and correct by certiorari supposed errors in the proceedings and judgments by a diocesan court in matters of ecclesiastical cognizance, such as charges of crime or immorality, against a clergyman of the church and because by deposition from his office a clergyman of the church, as the result of a sentence by a diocesan court, is deprived of the right or power to exercise the power or functions of a minister of the church and of the right to earn his salary as such minister, a property right is not thereby involved which will give the civil courts jurisdiction to review by certiorari the action of such diocesan court, there being no vested property right in a clergyman to exercise the functions of his office to the end that he may earn and have a salary. [b] Removal of Roman catholic priest.—By the laws and customs of the Roman catholic church in the United States, a priest is liable to be removed from the charge of a congregation at the pleasure of his bishop, without trial. O'Donovan v. Chatard, 97 Ind. 421, 49 AmR 462. But see Stack v. O'Hara, 98 Pa. 213 (holding, however, that he cannot be suspended from his priestly functions and ministerial duties without specific accusation and trial).

[c] Sequestration of temporalities.—No church judiciary can sequester the temporalities of the church, society, or corporation, because of the deposition of the minister, nor, where the society has been incorporated, supply the pulpit temporarily, or otherwise, against the will of the trustees. Robertson v. Bullions, 9 Barb. 64 [aff 11 N. Y. 243].

[d] Delegation by synod of its judicial power.—The synod of a church has no power to appoint a commission to receive the submission of a presbytery, which has been on trial before the synod, and to restore or dissolve the presbytery, as the commissioners may think proper. This is a delegation of judicial power not warranted by any known rules of discipline in the "Associate Church." Smith v. Nelson, 18 Vt. 511.

fere.[18] Where the church tribunal has only advisory powers, its decisions on matters referred to it, while not conclusive on the courts,[19] are entitled to great weight.[20]

[§ 191] 3. Legislative Supervision. Subject to constitutional guaranties as to religious liberty[21] regulatory legislation affecting the temporalities of the church may be sustained.[22]

[§ 192] B. Admission, Expulsion, and Rights of Member.[23] Civil courts have no jurisdiction to review the action of competent church authority in expelling a member,[24] an appeal lying to the higher tribunal of the church wherever available.[25] Nor will the civil courts review the judgments of the general assembly of a church, cutting off synods of the church,[26] or the action of a synod rejecting a minister's application for membership,[27] or the action of a religious society in admitting or rejecting members,[28] or the action of the ecclesiastical authorities determining whether a person died in the faith of the Roman catholic church entitling him to interment in the cemetery of the church.[29] Even in equity the judgments of religious associations, bearing upon their own members, are not examinable, except where they affect civil rights,[30] and equity has no jurisdiction to compel a faction of a religious body to cease worshiping in its church because of an abandonment of the faith, laws, usages, and customs of the church.[31] It is held, however, that civil courts may inquire whether the expulsion was the act of the church or of persons who were not the church, and who consequently had no right to excommunicate anyone,[32] and that the ecclesiastical tribunal of a denomination will be enjoined from expelling a member of a local congregation for alleged spiritual offenses, when it appears that such tribunal has not been organized in conformity with the organic law of the church;[33] and where a member of a religious society is expelled, and he deems himself aggrieved in his rights of property thereby, the courts will examine the judgment of expulsion to see if it has been regularly made on due notice and a hearing, and if not will disregard it and give proper relief.[34]

[a] By congregation of congregational church.—When persons have voluntarily associated themselves into a society of christians, recognizing no ecclesiastical tribunal with authority to revise its final determination, such a church is what is denominated congregational, and has the exclusive right to deal with its defaulting members, and the courts cannot supervise or control that jurisdiction. Lucas v. Case, 9 Bush (Ky.) 297.

[b] On insufficient evidence.—The action of a religious society, empowered to expel any member acting against its interest, in expelling members for such reason upon a proper hearing, is final, and is not reviewable by a court on the ground that the evidence on which the expulsion was based was insufficient; and hence exceptions to a master's report that a society's expulsion of members was ineffectual on the ground of insufficient evidence will be sustained. Canadian Religious Assoc. v. Parmenter, 180 Mass. 415, 62 NE 740.

[c] For subversive opinions and doctrines.—The ministers and elders of the society of believers, commonly called "shakers," have the power to expel members of the society, and where they expel a member for entertaining opinions and promulgating doctrines within the society at variance with the established belief and subversive of the organization, the courts have no power or jurisdiction in an action of tort for such expulsion to determine whether or not the opinions and doctrines of such expelled member were in fact inconsistent with the society's established belief. Grosvenor v. United Soc. of Believers, 118 Mass. 78.

[25] See case infra this note.

[b] Excommunication. — Where the relation between an independent baptist church and its members is not contractual, and no property or civil rights depend on membership, a court of equity, having jurisdiction in ecclesiastical matters only as an incident to the ascertainment of civil rights, cannot determine whether the excommunication of members of such church was conducted in accordance with the usages and laws of the church. [a] Schism.—The members of a church having divided into two factions on account of a difference in religious belief and faith, each claiming that its faith is that on which the church was founded, the action of the majority faction, in deciding in its own favor and expelling the members of the other faction, is not conclusive, but such majority faction having in fact departed from the faith, its action was not that of the church, but was nugatory. [a] Closing church.—Where the trustees and certain members of a religious society closed the society's church, held in trust for its members, against the wishes of other members desirous of continuing worship there in accordance with the constitutional object of the society, and expelled those members without a proper motion and hearing, the court, on the petition of the society, will restrain such trustees and members from closing the church against religious services held by members in accordance with the society's object. Canadian Religious Assoc. v. Parmenter, 180 Mass. 415, 62 NE 740.

But in the absence of objections to the jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical tribunal, its judgment will not be reviewed by the civil courts.[35]

[§ 193] C. Deposition, Discharge, or Removal of Minister. The deposition or removal of a minister,[36] and the grounds therefor,[37] are purely ecclesiastical matters, and the civil courts will not review the decision of competent ecclesiastical tribunals in regard thereto,[38] even where the powers of the tribunal are merely advisory where it appears that its advice was followed by the ecclesiastical body competent to act.[39] Even a court of equity will not consider the question involved until all ecclesiastical remedies have been exhausted.[40] Nor will the civil courts take original jurisdiction of such matters where there are ecclesiastical tribunals competent to deal with them.[41] But the civil court will review the questions as to whether the ecclesiastical tribunal had jurisdiction to try the minister,[42] and whether he was tried in the way prescribed by the constitution of the church.[43] The court will issue a writ of prohibition against a church tribunal acting in excess of its jurisdiction,[44] and will enjoin the removal of a minister who has had no opportunity for hearing and trial where, under the law of the land, if not under the laws of the church, he is entitled to such trial and hearing.[45] While generally the civil courts will not review the act of an ecclesiastical tribunal deposing or removing a minister,[46] they may adjudicate questions relating to the effect of the deposition or removal upon civil rights,[47] except where the existence of the alleged civil rights are conditioned on the continued existence of the pastoral relation and it appears that such relation has been terminated by the decision of a competent ecclesiastical tribunal.[48]

[§ 194] D. Amendment of Church Constitution. The decision of the general conference of a religious society upon a proposed revision, amendment, or change of constitution or faith is binding upon civil courts,[49] unless its decision is attacked on grounds of jurisdiction[50] or violation of a trust.[51] On appeal from a decree of a court having jurisdiction amending the charter of a church, where no breach of trust is involved, the only question reviewable is the regularity of the proceedings as shown by the record brought up by certiorari.[52] But the action of the general conference of the church in adopting the report of the committee that the amended constitution as submitted to vote had become the organic law of the church has been held to be merely legislative, and not an adjudication binding upon civil courts.[53]

[§ 195] E. Election and Removal of Officers. The question who are the officers of a religious society is to be determined according to the discipline of that society,[54] and civil courts will not review the decision of a competent ecclesiastical body upon a question involving the election of officers.[55] Nor does a statute to prevent fraudulent elections by incorporated companies confer upon the civil courts power to determine the validity of an election of the trustees of an incorporated religious society,[56] nor does it warrant action by the court in advance of an election being held solely on an assumption, unsupported by evidence, that it will be conducted illegally or improperly.[57] A court cannot assume powers of removal delegated to an ecclesiastical board by a deed of trust,[58] but it has jurisdiction to review removal proceedings of the board to determine whether they conform to the trust requirements.[59]

[b] Order of bishop.—The vestry of an episcopal church cannot be relieved by the civil courts from an order of the bishop, made in accordance with the rules and canons of the church, forbidding a clergyman to officiate as rector of such church. [§ 196] F. Procedure. The conduct of a trial before an ecclesiastical tribunal depends upon the articles and by-laws of the society or congregation,[60] as does also the question whether a member on trial is entitled to counsel,[61] although, in the absence of any provision in the by-laws on the matter, a member is not entitled to counsel as a matter of law where no charges are made and no issue is to be tried.[62] In the absence of provisions in articles or by-laws, a member or officer cannot be deprived of his rights and privileges without a hearing or trial upon adequate notice,[63] and the courts are unwilling to construe charters, by-laws, or rules as depriving members of membership without a hearing,[64] but a member waives his right to a hearing or trial by refusing to submit to it.[65] Church tribunals are not required to conform to all the rules applicable to courts of public justice and are not governed by strict rules of legal evidence,[66] and evidence may be referred to a committee for its findings,[67] and one hearing is not a bar to another hearing upon the same charge,[68] and while the constitution of the church may provide that no one who participated in the trial by which a member was expelled shall sit in the appellate tribunal,[69] and while the fact that a part of the members of an ex parte council were members of a previous council which had decided adversely to the minister on the same issues will vitiate their findings in the second council,[70] the fact that the church meeting which voted to accept the decision of a mutual council as to the disqualifications of their minister, and to dismiss him, was composed almost entirely of the aggrieved members of the church, at whose request the mutual council had been called to investigate his conduct, did not disqualify them.[71]

XI. CONSOLIDATION

[§ 197] A. In General. Religious societies have an inherent right to consolidate subject only to such restrictions as may be imposed by their own constitution, rules, and discipline,[72] by the trusts, express or implied, under which they hold their property,[73] or by statutes[74] or charter.[75] Consolidation is the result of agreement entered into between the societies themselves that follow the congregational type of church government,[76] or between judicatories having power to act in the case of societies which have adopted the presbyterial or episcopal polity,[77]

[§ 198] B. As Affected by Church Constitution, Rules, and Discipline—1. In General. Consolidation of churches, to be effective, must conform to the requirements of their constitutions, by-laws, and discipline,[80] the churches being represented therein by the bodies having authority under their constitutions to act.[81]

[§ 199] 2. Powers of Church Judicatory. Where the consolidating churches have the presbyterial form of church government, and the power to amend the constitution and confession of faith rests in the supreme judicatory, a consolidation effected by the judicatory in conformity to the constitution and confession of faith as amended by it,[82] and in the absence of fraud,[83] is valid,[84] nor in such case is ratification by the church members necessary,[85] unless a statute requires it;[86] and where the supreme judicatory has been held to have jurisdiction to declare the validity of the union between branches of the church, its declaration to that effect, being an ecclesiastical question,[87] is binding on the civil courts;[88] but the validity of the union has been denied wherever courts have taken the view that amendment of the constitution and confession of faith was beyond the power of the judicatory.[89] Where the statute requires that an agreement to consolidate shall have the approval of a church judicatory,[90] the court will not assume jurisdiction to enjoin the consolidation proceedings on grounds cognizable by the church judicatory.[91]

[§ 200] C. As Affected by Statutes and Charters—1. In General. While unincorporated religious societies have an inherent right to consolidate,[92] subject to restrictions,[93] religious corporations cannot consolidate without legislative authority to be found either in charter or statute,[94] and without conforming thereto.[95] Where the statutes of the state relating to corporations are construed as permitting the consolidation only of corporations of a similar nature, a church corporation organized under a religious corporations law cannot consolidate with a benevolent, charitable, or missionary society organized under the Membership Corporations Law.[96] The incorporation of a consolidated church composed of members of the separate churches named in the articles of association under a statute authorizing the incorporation of churches is not void on the ground that the statute provided only for the incorporation of single churches taken separately.[97] A consolidated church corporation, formed by the merger of

[a] Oral consolidation.—(1) Where two religious corporations made an oral consolidation, without any attempt to observe the statutory provision relating to consolidation of such corporations, the consolidation was ineffective to transfer any of plaintiff's property to the new society, and was ultra vires and void. [97] Neale v. St. Paul's Church, 8 Gill (Md.) 116, 118.

"Here it is objected that two societies united for the purposes contemplated. Does not the very act of union constitute them one? Not two separate church corporations, is subject to the statute in force at the time of the consolidation obligating it to administer its temporalities according to denominational rules and discipline,[98] and not to statutes in force when the separate churches were incorporated giving each the right to administer its temporalities irrespective of denominational considerations.[99]

[§ 201] 2. Sanction of Court. Where the statute requires the consent of the court to the consolidation,[1] the court has discretionary power to permit or prohibit consolidation regardless of the consolidation agreement of the churches involved,[2] and where the consent of the court is not secured, the consolidation is void,[3] and the agreement of the churches to consolidate may be set aside at the instance of a single dissenting church member.[4] Where the purpose of the consolidation is to evade certain obligations and restrictions of church polity and faith, the court is justified in withholding its consent.[5] Even where the consent has been obtained, the consolidation will be declared void where shown to be the result of illegal conspiracy to deprive one of the churches of its property.[6]

[§ 202] 3. Validity of Consolidation of Church Corporations.[7] A consolidation of church corporations of the same faith into one chartered body in conformity with the rules and discipline of the church and the requirements of the statute, and within the chartered powers of the churches affected, is valid,[8] even though it involves the surrender of the name and organization of one of the merged churches[9] and the transfer of trust property, if there is nothing in the terms of the trust to prohibit such a union.[10] But consolidation of church corporations is void in the absence of charter or statutory authority to consolidate,[11] nor without authority can consolidation be effected by the transfer of the property by one corporation to the other.[12] But such authority may be granted by amendment of the charter of one of the corporations enlarging its powers so that it may take over the property of the other.[13] A consolidation of two congregations, one incorporated and one unincorporated, does not of itself effect an incorporated consolidated church, not even de facto, where no attempt to incorporate the consolidated body has been made.[14] The incorporation of the congregations of two churches as one church, each to retain its individual character with respect to its property, and the enforcement of the payment of moneys due to it, the selection of pastors, and other administrative matters, is not allowed, the preservation of the autonomy of each church in the respects desired being inconsistent with the legal requisites of a corporation.[15]

[§ 203] D. As Affected by Trust Provisions. The right to consolidate is not affected by the fact that the churches hold property granted to them specifically by name for their use, where it is shown that

that they have united in doctrine; that they expressly reserve. But united certainly in name and designation, 'a church;' as one corporation with respect to the property owned and possessed by them, and the mutual enjoyment and dedication of it in common for religious purposes." Nor were the consolidation statutes designed to authorize the consolidation of an existing religious corporation with one organized solely for the purpose of consolidation, but they were designed to enable existing religious corporations, organized in good faith for the advancement of religious interests, and for a time carried on for such purpose, to consolidate, when it becomes apparent that such interests can be better advanced by the union of the corporations." consolidation serves and does not violate the purposes of trust provisions under which it is held.[16] The fact that the name is lost in consolidation does not prove a breach of trust in the absence of a trust requirement that the name should be retained.[17]

[§ 204] E. Effect of Consolidation. The effect of consolidation on the rights of the parties depends on the nature of the consolidation agreement and the proceedings thereunder.[18] A consolidation under an agreement providing merely for joint meetings of the congregations under a single pastor does not of itself effect a transfer of title of the property belonging to the separate societies,[19] but where the agreement provides for a transfer of all the property rights of the separate churches to the consolidated church, title to property passes by the consolidation.[20] Upon a consolidation of separate church corporations into one church corporation, the separate corporations cease to exist where the statute so provides.[21] Where a consolidation has been effected, there is no right of the merged congregation to secede and take back its property where no such right is reserved in the consolidation agreement nor provided for in the rules and discipline of the consolidated church,[22] but where the agreement provides for the building of a new church edifice for the consolidated congregations and that each should retain title to its old building, a dissolution of the consolidated organization into its component parts before the building of the new edifice does not operate to give to each congregation a share in one of the old buildings in which the consolidated congregation had worshipped.[23]

XII. DISSOLUTION AND REORGANIZATION

[§ 205] A. Dissolution—1. In General. While a religious society, having discharged all its liabilities, may by its own act cause its own dissolution,[24] as, for example, by the withdrawal of every individual member from it,[25] or by a vote, at a meeting called on notice, declaring the society dissolved,[26] or by abandonment and nonuser,[27] a dissolution cannot be caused by the withdrawal of some, leaving others to carry on its corporate activities,[28] or by failure to elect officers,[29] or by loss of its meeting house,[30] or by withdrawal from a superior church body,[31] or by an ineffective attempt to consolidate with another society.[32] A church which is a member of a church organization in which a superior church judicatory has the constitutional power to dissolve member churches may be dissolved by such judicatory,[33] subject, however, to any statutory restrictions which may exist.[34] Where an unincorporated religious society consists of annual meetings of delegates from its constituent members, the organization is dissolved on adjournment of such meeting into its individual elements until reassembled pursuant to common agreement.[35]

[§ 206] 2. By Legislature or Court. An incorporated religious society may have its charter annulled and its existence as a civil body terminated by act of the legislature where the right to amend, alter, or repeal is reserved,[36] but not otherwise.[37] It may, however, be dissolved by the court in proceedings instituted by the state for forfeiture of its charter where grounds for forfeiture exist,[38] and the state cannot be barred by laches in such proceedings.[39]

[38] State v. Hutterische Bruder Gemeinde, 46 S. D. 189, 191 NW 635.

[39] State v. Hutterische Bruder Gemeinde, supra.

In some states statutes provide for the dissolution of religious societies by the court,[40] and a statutory authorization to the court to do so on application of a majority of the trustees does not necessitate action by the board of trustees at a meeting duly called for the purpose.[41] But the court acting under such statute has no power to dissolve a religious society incorporated under an earlier statute containing no such provision.[42] Even where the power of the court to dissolve exists, it will not be exercised against the protest of a minority on the alleged ground that the society is in an unprosperous condition and that it is inexpedient to continue to occupy the present church edifice as a place of public worship.[43]

Appointment of receiver. Regardless of whether or not a court may take the property of a religious corporation out of the hands of its trustees and place it in the hands of receivers as an incidental proceeding in a suit by the state for the forfeiture of the corporation's charter,[44] it cannot do so in ex parte proceedings on a petition unsworn to, brought by parties having no interest in the property, and on the production before the court of no evidence in support thereof.[45] Nor can it do so on a petition alleging as unlawful certain acts which by its terms are shown to have been approved by trustees and members of the church.[46] Nor can a minority force a dissolution and liquidation by receivership proceedings on the ground that they are tenants in common and as such entitled to a sale and division of the property.[47] Jurisdiction of the court to appoint a receiver of a religious corporation is not conferred by the statute giving it power to sanction sales of its real estate.[48]

[§ 207] 3. Disposition of property. On dissolution of a church, trust funds belonging to it should be disposed of in the way best calculated to carry out the intentions of the founders of the trust.[49] And funds will not revert to the contributors or their heirs where given to the society upon a consideration which the contributors received from the society at the time and continued to enjoy up to the time of the dissolution.[50] Where a church is organized in subordination to an incorporated general conference, whose charter provides that property of a church member which should become extinct should vest in the conference, the conference is entitled to the proceeds of the property of any extinct church member.[51] And where, under the church discipline, a superior judicatory is entitled to the proceeds of the property of extinct churches, it may direct the disposition of such property.[52] But under statutes restricting the power of the church judicatory to the dissolution of the church as an ecclesiastical body, the trustees of the church corporation continue to hold title to the church property after the dissolution of the ecclesiastical body although the superior judicatory under the terms of the statute may compel them to administer it for denominational purposes.[53] Where a consolidation agreement provides for a retention by each of the consolidating churches of its own property until the happening of a contingency which never happened, a dissolution of the consolidated church has no effect upon the title to the properties which remains with respect to each church as it was before the consolidation.[54]

[§ 208] B. Reorganization. Formal dissolution of the old church corporation is not a necessary condition precedent to reincorporation. A practical dissolution by neglect to elect trustees is sufficient.[55] The identity of a religious corporation is not changed merely by reincorporation, but the question is one of intention.[56] Where a new corporation entirely independent of the old is formed, it has no right to declare the first extinct and to appropriate the property of the old.[57] Where reorganization is carried out in good faith for the purpose of forming a new corporation, property subsequently acquired by the new corporation is not liable for the debts of the old corporation,[58] even though the property formerly belonging to the old corporation may be so liable.[59] A court may, in its discretion, appoint a master to reconcile litigating factions and to effect under court auspices a reorganization of the divided church.[60]

XIII. ACTIONS[61]

[§ 209] A. By Society or Members—1. By Members or Officers of Unincorporated Society. A voluntary religious association which has never been incorporated has no legal existence and cannot sue,[62] except in states where by statute suits in the name of an unincorporated association are allowed,[63] but an action brought in the name of the society by its trustees, named, will be regarded as a suit by the trustees in behalf of the society and as such may be maintained.[64] A part of the persons belonging to a voluntary religious society, and having a common interest, may sue in behalf of themselves and others having the like interest, as part of the same society for purposes, common to all, and beneficial to all,[65] or they may be authorized to do so by resolution of a church judicatory having power to grant such authorization,[66] or the officers and agents of the society may bring an action in behalf of themselves and other members,[67] or they may sue in their own names when authorized by the society to do so,[68] even though they are not members of the congregation,[69] or an officer of the association may sue in his own name to enforce an obligation, the legal title to which is vested in him for the benefit of the association;[70] but officers without authority or title cannot sue in their own names.[71]

[§ 210] 2. By Quasi Corporation. In states where unincorporated religious societies are given by statute limited corporate powers,[72] a religious society having a quasi-corporate existence may sue in its own name on a contract made with it in its associate capacity.[73] In such case, an information by the attorney-general on relation of the trustees of the society is not the proper remedy.[74]

[§ 211] 3. By Incorporated Society. It has been held that in order to give an organization for public worship legal rights, such as to sue, and to impose upon it legal obligations as a corporate body, there must be either a special law declaring its existence, or an incorporation under the provisions of the general law relating to religious societies,[75] and in the absence of any statute authorizing actions in favor of a religious corporation, the president of such corporation cannot maintain an action therefor in his own name, and designating himself as president in his pleadings is a mere description of the person.[76] An exception to this rule exists in the case of the Roman catholic church in the Philippines which is a juridical entity and may maintain an action in the courts of the Philippine Islands although not registered as a corporation.[77] But where the charter or incorporating statute and the power thereunder to bring suit are shown, the right of the corporation to bring suit to enforce payment of its claim is established,[78] and such right is not affected by the fact that its officers are de facto, not having been legally elected,[79] or that there is a vacancy in an office,[80] or that it has not caused certificates of incorporation to be filed in the office of the secretary of state,[81] or that it has lost its corporate existence by nonuser or failure to keep up its church organization,[82] or that it is holding real estate in excess of the amount allowed by law,[83] or that it has altered its doctrines, worship, or discipline,[84] or that it has an equitable, but not a legal, title to the property which it seeks to recover,[85] or that the action was not authorized by the trustees, the governing body of the corporation.[86] Generally it is held that a suit by a religious corporation must be brought in its corporate name,[87] and not in the names of its members,[88] but trustees of a religious corporation have been held to be proper parties plaintiff to bring suit to compel the enforcement of provisions in a will in favor of the corporation.[89] Where under the statute the trustees of a religious society are the corporate body with power to sue and be sued,[90] an action may be brought by them to enforce a building bond running to the building committee of the church as obligee,[91] and an action may be brought in their names on an obligation entered into between their predecessors as trustees for the society and third persons,[92] and without joining their predecessors as parties plaintiff,[93] and a presumption of their lawful incorporation exists in the absence of evidence to the contrary.[94] Under some statutes it has been held that an incorporated religious society must sue in the name of its trustees,[95] but trustees who have withdrawn from the church and abandoned their rights in the property may not institute an action in the name of the corporation,[96] and persons subsequently elected as trustees but who were not trustees at the time action was brought may not institute the action.[97]

"There ought to be no doubt about the right of unincorporated religious societies to sue on a contract made with them in their associate capacity and for the legitimate purposes of their association, even though there be no persons named or described in the contract as trustees or committee-men on behalf of the society. Such associations have always, and especially since the Act of 1731, been recognized as having an associate and quasi corporate existence in law, with power to hold land and build appropriate houses, and of course with power to acquire rights by contract, and to vindicate them. And if the English common law forms are insufficient for such cases, we admit the infusion into our law of the plain equity principle that allows a committee of voluntary societies to sue and be sued as representatives of the whole." [§ 212] B. Against Society or Members—1. Against Members or Officers of Unincorporated Society. Following the general rule in actions against unincorporated associations generally,[98] an unincorporated religious society cannot be sued as such.[99] If unincorporated, the individual members may be sued collectively, or, if too numerous to admit of all being brought before the court, one or more may be sued, and may defend for the whole,[1] and one holding the legal title should be made a party.[2] A suit may be brought against the trustees only[3] and execution levied against the trust property.[4] A religious community may be sued in the name of its trustees.[5]

[§ 213] 2. Against Quasi Corporation. A religious society, endowed by statute with legal existence and vested with certain powers, although not incorporated, may be sued on the few obligations it is empowered to incur,[6] but a suit against an unincorporated religious society by name, being a nullity,[7] cannot be changed by amendment into a suit against a quasi-incorporated body.[8]

[§ 214] 3. Against Incorporated Society. A church if incorporated must be sued by its corporate name.[9] Suit should not be brought against the members individually,[10] or against the trustees,[11] unless the trustees constitute the incorporated body,[12] although in the latter case it has been held that the trustees should be sued as a corporation and not as trustees.[13] Where, however, the statute so provides,[14] action may be brought against the churchwardens of an incorporated church, designated as such.[15] In an action against trustees to enjoin their ejecting a clergyman, the church corporation should be made a party.[16]

[§ 215] C. Between Societies and Their Members. The rule forbidding actions between partners on partnership demands[17] does not apply to voluntary associations and their officers and members.[18] A trustee may sue other trustees of the same society to restrain their unlawful acts,[19] as, for example, a consolidation with another society in violation of the terms of the trust under which the property is held,[20] and it is not necessary that he should make an annual conference of which the church is a member a party to the suit.[21] So also one member of a governing board is accountable to the other members for funds collected for a church purpose.[22] Members of an unincorporated association, by delegating to its board of education, a corporation, power to supervise and conduct the administration of its schools and colleges, do not thereby deprive themselves of the right and power to sue its colleges and their trustees to prevent violations of trust and for accountings of property wrongfully disposed of.[23] And so a member may sue trustees of an incorporated religious society to enjoin their wrongful interference with his membership rights,[24] to which suit the corporation is a proper but not a necessary party where the trustees' acts are alleged to be unauthorized.[25] But a member is not entitled to a personal judgment against other members and to a lien on church property on a note signed by such other members and partly paid by the church in the absence of evidence as to the nature of the transaction and in what proportion the members were to contribute toward the payment if it was a church obligation.[26] A church corporation which has adopted the congregational form of church government cannot sue to enjoin some of its members interfering in the church government and in its use of the church property, in the absence of authority granted to it by the congregation for the institution of the suit.[27] Nor can a church corporation sue some of its former members to recover the value of property which belonged to the members of the church and which had been illegally converted to other uses by defendants prior to the incorporation of the church.[28] Conflicting claims by church societies to the same property are cognizable in the civil courts.[29] Nor is the right of a society to prosecute its claim barred by lapse of time not exceeding the statutory limitation, and not amounting to laches prejudicing the rights of defendant.[30] But where there is a schism and a faction withdraws, abandoning its claim to the church property, its successors after a long period of time and after the death of all the secessionists cannot revive the claim to the church property.[31] An action to prevent the use of church property in violation of the terms of a trust should be brought against the church in control of the property,[32] and not against the rector preaching doctrine in violation of the trust terms who has no individual right to the property.[33] In an action by trustees of a church to have a trust on parsonage property in favor of preachers of the church declared void, the attorney-general, as representing future preachers and future congregations, should be made a party.[34] In an action to determine the rights to offices in a religious society between conflicting claimants, all claimants should be made parties thereto.[35]

[§ 216] D. Process and Appearance.[36] A statute authorizing service of process on an unincorporated business association by leaving a copy of the summons at its usual place of business has no application to unincorporated religious associations permitting service thereon by leaving a copy of summons at the church.[37] In such case service must be made upon the parties who are the debtors in the case.[38] Upon whom process against religious corporations may be served depends upon the statutes under which they are organized.[39] Under some statutes service must be made on the president personally, or at the office of the corporation, if it holds such in permanence, by delivery to some of its agents,[40] but where the service is at the office, it must appear either in the petition or in the sheriff's return that the person served was an agent of the corporation authorized to receive service.[41] Under other statutes, service must be made on the trustees of the corporation or on the officers appointed by them.[42] Service on the last-appointed treasurer and vestryman of an incorporated church with a dormant parish is sufficient to give the court jurisdiction even though the church defaults.[43] The statement in a summons as to the capacity in which plaintiff sues may be amended to conform to the fact.[44]

[§ 217] E. Pleading.[45] The facts entitling plaintiff to relief in an action by or against a religious society must be set forth in the petition,[46] as for example, authorization to sue, in an action brought by trustees of an incorporated[47] or unincorporated religious society,[48] authorization by defendants of the work done, in an action to recover for work and material upon a church building,[49] absolute conveyance to church authorities free of trust, in an action to remove alleged implied trusts as clouds upon the title,[50] conformity by the minority and nonconformity by the majority to the rules and discipline of the church, in an action by a minority of church trustees to enjoin interference by the majority,[51] bad faith or conspiracy to injure, in an action by a church member seeking relief from disciplinary proceedings against him,[52] right under church rules to a new trial on charges against a member after decision by conference on appeal, in an action to recover damages for refusal to grant it,[53] a threat to oust the officers of a church from its management, in an action for an injunction,[54] the civil rights and powers of a church with reference to certain rules and regulations upon which plaintiff bases his right to recover, in an action by a pastor to recover his salary from the bishop of a Roman catholic church,[55] removal by the proper ecclesiastical authority, in an action to restrain a rector acting as such for failure to comply with church tenets.[56] In an action against a bishop as trustee for a religious congregation on a contract alleged to have been made by an officer of the congregation, an affidavit of defense stating that the congregation was incorporated and that the officer had no authority from the corporation to make the alleged contract is sufficient to prevent summary judgment.[57] An application for a writ of garnishment signed by a single church trustee is sufficient, the trustee's authority to represent the church being presumed whether the church was incorporated or unincorporated.[58] Incorporation of a religious society is not sufficiently alleged by a recital in the pleading that defendants were members of a religious society.[59] Trustees of a church, incorporated or unincorporated, in declaring on their title need not set forth how the trust was created or how their title accrued, it being sufficient to aver the fact of their property and the injury.[60] The officer of a religious congregation on whom process was served as alleged agent for the purpose of process of a religious society organized as a legal entity under the statute may plead nul tiel corporation in his own name or in the name of the society.[61]

[§ 218] F. Issues and Proof.[62] If the declaration against a church as a corporation is not traversed by a denial of the incorporation, proof of a de jure incorporation is not required of plaintiff if a de facto incorporation is shown.[63] Evidence that defendant church is not a corporation is not admissible in the absence of a specification of defense taking issue with the allegation in the writ that it was.[64] Evidence that defendants were trustees of a religious society and so entitled to possession of its property is not admissible under a general denial in an action by the society and its trustees against certain individuals named as trespassers.[65]

[§ 219] G. Evidence[66]—1. Presumptions and Burden of Proof. A presumption of incorporation exists where a church is sued as an entity and answers to the merits without raising that issue.[67] A presumption favors the regularity of proceedings brought in the name of all the trustees of a church,[68] and the signing of the necessary applications and affidavits by one is presumed to have been authorized by all.[69] A presumption favors the authority of church trustees to incur indebtedness for the repair and improvement of the church property in the absence of church regulations to the contrary.[70] There is no presumption arising from the fact that notes, purporting to be corporate notes, were signed by the president, secretary, and treasurer in their official character, that they were authorized or based on a legal consideration.[71] No presumption as to powers of church judicatories arises from the mere name of the church,[72] nor will the power to remove a rector be presumed from the power of appointment and transfer.[73] The burden is on the plaintiff to prove that the acts of the church official upon which he bases his right to recover were either authorized[74] or ratified by the church.[75]

[§ 220] 2. Admissibility.[76] The general rules as to the admissibility of evidence on grounds of its competency[77] and relevancy[78] are applicable in actions by or against religious societies.[79] Canons and customs of church are not admissible to contradict the terms of a deed.[80] An offer by a church to pay plaintiff for his pews, unaccepted and later withdrawn, is not admissible as evidence of plaintiff's ownership.[81] Evidence of a church usage that a pewholder is not entitled to compensation for pews lost on sale of the church is admissible in an action of a pewholder to recover, even though the witness can testify to only one or two instances in support of the custom.[82] Evidence that church members knew the facts upon the basis of which an estoppel against them is claimed is admissible on that issue.[83] That property was paid for by contributions of members of an unincorporated religious society is admissible as tending to show that such society was the equitable owner of the property and entitled to its use as against an incorporated society holding the legal title.[84] Connection with other so-called religious associations proved to have followed immoral practices is admissible to prove familiarity with, and knowledge of, such practices on the part of the founder of an association which plaintiff alleges he was fraudulently induced to join and as bearing upon the issue of fraud.[85]

[§ 221] 3. Weight and Sufficiency. The general rules as to the weight and sufficiency of evidence[86] are applicable in actions by or against religious societies.[87] Hearsay evidence, if received without objection and is uncontradicted, is sufficient to support a finding of the existence of the fact testified to therein.[88] Church membership is sufficiently proved by admission contained in the pleading.[89] That a building contract was the contract of a religious corporation executed by its duly authorized agent is sufficiently proved by an admission to that effect contained in the original answer of the corporation even though the authority was denied in a later amended answer.[90] The authority of a rector to bind the church in the employment of an architect is not sufficiently established by proof that he was president of the vestry in the absence of evidence of church regulations giving the president that power.[91] Authority of a rector to waive provisions of a building contract is not proved by evidence of his authority to make the contract.[92] Authority by a board of church trustees to its president to sign a note is not sufficiently proved by evidence merely of conversation between the trustees as to the need of money in the absence of evidence of any vote or resolution.[93] Evidence that a note was signed by the president, secretary, and treasurer of a religious corporation is not sufficient to charge the corporation with liability thereon in the absence of evidence that the note was made with the authority of the trustees.[94] Proof that the conveyance of church property was executed by de facto trustees of the church held out by the church as having authority to convey is sufficient to establish the conveyance as the act of the church.[95] Execution of a contract by a religious corporation is not proved by signature of an individual followed by initials indicating his membership in another religious order.[96] Clear and convincing proof of fraud on the part of church trustees in securing a consolidation of churches and a conveyance of its property by the merged church is not established by the testimony of an equal number of witnesses on both sides of that issue.[97]

[§ 222] H. Dismissal and Nonsuit.[98] Following general rules,[99] it has been held that, where there is no evidence in the case in support of plaintiff's claim, a nonsuit should be ordered.[1] A suit brought by trustees of a church will not be dismissed at the instance of individual trustees acting in their private interests against the wishes of members and the other trustees.[2]

[§ 223] I. Trial—1. Questions of Law and Fact. General rules governing questions of law and fact[3] are applicable in actions by or against religious societies.[4] While it is a question of law for the court to determine whether there is any evidence in support of the material issues of the case which will warrant its submission to the jury,[5] the weight and sufficiency of the evidence are for the jury, and if there is evidence in the case which fairly tends to support plaintiff's right to recover, it is error to direct a verdict for defendant.[6] And so, in actions involving a conflict of evidence on the issue, it has been held to be a question of fact for the jury whether a religious society was a corporation at a particular time,[7] whether the book of discipline of the church had in effect been adopted in lieu of by-laws,[8] whether a particular officer of a religious corporation had authority to make a contract,[9] whether an unauthorized contract had been ratified,[10] whether a rector was authorized to bind the church by his acceptance of the architect's plans,[11] whether a sale of building materials by a contractor acting for a church which had abandoned its building contract was authorized by the church.[12]

[§ 224] 2. Instructions. Following the rules as to instructions generally,[13] it has been held in actions in which a religious society was a party that instructions must present the issues raised by the evidence,[14] and that requests for instructions not conforming to the evidence are properly refused.[15]

[§ 225] 3. Findings. Findings must be responsive to the issues made by the pleadings.[16] A finding of court that the proceedings on appeal from one ecclesiastical court to another were so irregular as to be null and void is responsive to averments in the pleading where the complaint alleged that the action of the appellate tribunal was without authority and the answer averred that it was in accordance with the procedure of the church courts.[17]

[§ 226] J. Judgment and Execution.[18] In an action against a religious corporation and its president jointly, a personal judgment against the president cannot be had in the absence of evidence showing personal liability.[19] A judgment enjoining certain members of a church from taking possession and control of church property and assuming management thereof, but permitting them to attend services and participate in the church meetings, is sufficiently definite to preserve defendants' rights as members.[20] Judgment against trustees of a religious community, rendered in an action on contracts made in behalf of the community, may be satisfied out of property belonging to the community.[21] Sale of land under execution on judgment against an unincorporated church society, as if it were incorporated, does not convey a good title.[22] Execution against a church cannot be satisfied out of a bank deposit in the name of the minister made up of general contributions given by church members to him but for no specific purpose.[23]

[§ 227] K. Costs.[24] Costs adjudged against a pastor in a dismissal suit cannot be set off against salary due him where the amount due is not involved in the dismissal action and where the dismissal was not conditioned on payment of arrears.[25] Where charges of misconduct are proved in an action to expel a member from a church corporation but the expulsion is denied on ground of errors in the procedure, he is not entitled to his costs although the action against him has failed.[26]

[§ 228] L. Receivers.[27] When an action involving title to an archbishopric is never brought to trial because of the appointment of a receiver to take over the church property, and later on motion the receivership is vacated, an order cannot be made that the church property be delivered over to one of the competitors for the office, such an order amounting to a decision on the merits of the controversy without trial.[28]

RELINQUISH.[4] To forsake, or abandon; quit; leave with reluctance; desist from; renounce a claim to.[5]

In an agreement to "relinquish an annuity" the term is sufficiently satisfied by the promisor abandoning, and not demanding it.[6]

As a word of conveyance "relinquish" does not import a conveyance of the fee, but rather the use of the land.[7]

[a] Authority to apply funds.—An instruction that defendant would be liable for church funds received by him from a church barbecue unless the church "at a regular, adjourned or called meeting" authorized him to apply on church notes which he held is not too restrictive in view of the evidence of the defendant that the authority was given at such meeting, and there was no evidence in the case of its being given at any other time. This judgment does not preclude either party from taking what is termed "plenary proceedings" or "ordinary proceedings" as to the same subject-matter, in which latter proceedings all defenses are open and neither party can set up the "remate judgment" as res judicata, although plaintiff may on giving security enforce the "remate judgment" notwithstanding ordinary or plenary proceedings have been taken. But when it is remembered that Cook's Law Office, the place of defendant's residence, was remote from any bank, that a safe private conveyance thence to Charleston was not likely to be obtained in reasonable time, and that remittance by mail was there usually adopted and had proved safe, it will be perceived that in using the term remit the defendant had reference to the mail." REMITTANCE.[62] Money sent by one person to another either in specie, bill of exchange, check, or otherwise.[63]

REMITTEE. A person to whom a remittance is made.[64]

REMITTER. A word, which when technically used, refers to a person procuring a foreign bill of exchange.[65]

In the law of real property "remitter" is defined to be "where he who hath the true property or jus proprietatis in lands, but is out of possession thereof, and hath no right to enter without recovering possession in an action, hath afterwards the freehold cast upon him by some subsequent, and of course defective, title; in this case he is remitted, or sent back by operation of law, to his ancient and more certain title.[66]

REMITTITUR. [§ 1] A. In General. The returning or sending back by a court of appeal of the record and proceedings in a cause, after its decision thereon, to the court whence the appeal came, in order that the cause may be tried anew, (where it is so ordered,) or that judgment may be entered in accordance with the decision on appeal, or execution be issued, or any other necessary action be taken in the court below.[67] The term may be used interchangeably with "mandate"[68] or "procedendo."[69]

At common law "remittitur of record" is a writ by which an appellate court hands back jurisdiction to the trial court.[70]

[§ 2] B. Remittitur Damna.[71] An entry made on record, in cases where a jury has given greater damages than a plaintiff has declared for.[72] While formerly "remittitur damna" was equivalent to a "retraxit,"[73] in its modern use it is more like a "discontinuance."[74]

REMNANTS AND SURPLUSES. A technical term, said to mean the remainder of the proceeds from the sale of ships to satisfy claims for seamen's wages, for bottomry bonds, for salvage services, and for supplies of material-men, after the satisfaction of such claims.[75]

REMODEL. A word of broad meaning.[76] Among other definitions it means to reform, reshape;[77] reconstruct;[78] to make over in a somewhat different way.[79]

Remodeling of a building is more than repairing it or making minor changes therein. The ordinary significance of the term imports a change in the remodeled building practically equivalent to a new one.[80]

REMONSTRANCE.[81] Expostulation; showing of reasons against something proposed.[82] More particularly, a petition to a court or deliberative body, in which those who have signed it request that something which is in contemplation to perform shall not be done;[83] a representation made to a court or legislative body wherein certain persons unite in urging that a contemplated measure be not adopted or passed.[84] The distinction between remonstrance and appeal is clear.[85]

"Though the exact nature of a remittitur damna, as known to the early English courts, is somewhat obscure, it seems to have been a final relinquishment or surrender of the damages awarded. Its first application was to cases where the jury awarded greater damages than were declared for. It is now sometimes so defined,—34 Cyc 1207—and frequently so used." Holbrook v. Quinlan, supra.

"Whatever may have been the character and effect of the common law remittitur, in recent times its use has been much extended and the effect given to it has been correspondingly modified. . . . With the change in the use and effect of a remittitur has come a change in the meaning of the term itself. Were we assured that it was used by the circuit court of appeals in its common law sense, we might feel constrained to give to it its common law effect. But we have come to use it, not in its common law sense, but in its modern sense,—to denote a mere temporary waiver,—a writing off of so much of the verdict,—an agreement not to proceed further for that particular item in that particular suit." *By Carolan Jefferson Walsh (Remnants–Removal inclusive).

REMONSTRATE.[86] To present and urge reasons in opposition to an act, measure, or any course of proceeding.[87]

REMOTE.[88] Removed;[89] inconsiderable; slight.[90] It is a very flexible term, which in the abstract conveys no definite idea;[91] a relative term.[92]

Phrases: "Remote and speculative damages,"[93] "remote damages,"[94] "remote or collateral facts,"[95] "remote profits,"[96] and "remote purchaser;"[97] also, "in a remote degree,"[98] "posts remote from the seacoast,"[99] "wools of merino blood, near or remote."[1]

REMOTE CAUSE.[2] While it has been impracticable to prescribe by abstract definition, applicable to all possible states of facts, what is a remote cause,[3] it has been defined as one which is inconclusive in reasoning, because from it no certain conclusion can be legitimately drawn;[4] or in other words, a cause the connection between which and the effect is uncertain, vague, or indeterminate;[5] one that does not contain in itself the element of necessity between it and its effect.[6] Among other definitions given to the term,[7] it has been defined as meaning that cause of which some indefinite[8] or independent force merely took advantage to accomplish something not the probable or natural effect thereof;[9] that which may have happened, and yet no injury have occurred notwithstanding that no injury could have occurred if it had not happened.[10]

REMOTENESS OF EVIDENCE.[11] When the fact or facts proposed to be established as a foundation from which indirect evidence may be drawn, by way of inference, have not a visible, plain, or necessary connection with the proposition eventually to be proved, such evidence is rejected for "remoteness."[12] The essence of remoteness is such a want of open and visible connection between the evidentiary and principal facts that, all things considered, the former is not worthy or safe to be admitted in proof of the latter.[13]

One is the mere temporary withdrawal of the power to exercise the duties of an office; the other is a complete and final deprivation of official tenure. McDowell v. Burnett, 92 S. C. 469, 75 SE 873. I. RIGHT OF REMOVAL IN GENERAL

[By Eustace W. Tomlinson

[§ 1] A. History and Purpose. The purpose of the creation of the right to remove a case from a state to a federal court was to enable a defendant to have claims against him under the federal constitution or federal statutes adjudicated in the first instance by a federal tribunal, and to enable him, when sued in the courts of a state of which he is not a citizen, to obtain freedom from local prejudice or influence.[1] The right of removal was first granted by the Judiciary Act of Sept. 24, 1789.[2] It was extended by the act of March 2, 1833, passed during the attempt at nullification by South Carolina,[3] and by the acts of March 3, 1863,[4] April 9, 1866,[5] May 11, 1866,[6] July 13, 1866,[7] July 27, 1866,[8] Febr. 5, 1867,[9] March 2, 1867,[10] July 27, 1868,[11] May 31, 1870,[12] Febr. 28, 1871,[13] and March 30, 1872.[14] All of these acts were incorporated in the Revised Statutes of 1873.[15] The right was further extended by the first act of March 3, 1875, an appropriation bill, which included a clause upon the subject;[16] and by the second act, known as the Judiciary Act of March 3, 1875, which was intended to extend the same to the full extent authorized by the constitution of the United States.[17] The right of removal was restricted by the act of March 3, 1887,[18] clerical errors in the enrollment of which were corrected by a statute reënacting it, approved Aug. 13, 1888.[19] Various provisions and portions of the earlier statutes were repealed by the later enactments;[20] and the act of Febr. 8, 1894, repealed so much of the former statutes as gave a right of removal to an officer of the United States engaged in the enforcement of the act to regulate congressional elections.[21]

Statutes now in force may be found in the United States Code, title 28, §§ 71–83.[22]

[§ 2] B. Nature and Source—1. In General. The right of removal of causes from a state court to a federal court is purely statutory,[23] existing only in such cases as congress has seen fit to provide for;[24] and it cannot be created or conferred by consent.[25] While the right has been said to be a substantial one,[26] it is not a constitutional right,[27] except in the sense that statutes conferring it are authorized by the constitution,[28] nor is it a vested right of property;[29] so it may be restricted[30] or taken away[31] by statute, and if it has not been exercised it is taken away by the repeal of the statute conferring the right.[32] Where a cause is removable under the general statutory provisions relating thereto, an intention on the part of congress to take away the right of removal by provisions of a particular statute will not be presumed, but must clearly appear.[33] On the other hand, the repeal of a statute expressly prohibiting removal of the causes provided for therein and the substitution of another statute therefor does not authorize removal of such causes.[34]

S. 10, 23 L. ed. 524 (where the court said that the experiences of parties immediately following the Civil War satisfied congress that legislation was required fully to protect litigants against state prejudices and influences, and it therefore provided greater facilities for the removal of causes between citizens of different states where it appeared that such influences existed); Pittsburgh, etc., R. Co. v. Wood, (Ind. A.) 84 NE 1009 (holding that the right of removal of a cause of action from a state to a federal court is premised on the fact that the state court does have jurisdiction of the action, but by reason of a federal question being involved the party against whom such question is raised has the privilege, at his election, at the proper time, of having the cause removed); Peo. v. Fortuna Estates, 10 Porto Rico Fed. 130, 134 (where it was said: "The securing of a tribunal presumed to be more impartial than a court of the state in which one of the litigants resides is the object of the Removal Acts").

[a] In Hawaii the rule is the same as to the right to remove a cause

[§ 3] 2. Constitutionality of Statutes. Statutes which provide for or restrict the removal of causes from a state to a federal court have been universally held to be within the authority conferred upon congress by the constitution of the United States, and so not unconstitutional.[35]

[§ 4] C. Impairment, Deprivation, or Waiver of Right[36]—1. Restriction or Impairment by State.[37] A state has no power to restrict or impair, directly or indirectly, a right granted by federal statutes to remove a cause from a court of the state to a federal court.[38] So a legislative enactment by a state which takes away a right of removal, or prohibits its exercise, is unconstitutional;[39] and a state statute creating a cause of action, and providing that it shall be enforced only in the state courts or in a designated state court, will not prevent the removal of such an action to a court of the United States.[40] Similarly, a state court cannot enjoin the removal of a cause from a territorial court to the federal court. Cornn v. Wardell, 4 Hawaii Fed. 605, 606 [cit Cyc].

Co., 261 Fed. 806 (holding that, while plaintiff may have a choice whether to bring his action in a state or federal court, when he has brought it in a state court defendant's right to remove is not a matter of choice); Lombardo v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 223 Fed. 427 (where the court pointed out that congress has a right to provide for the removal of one class of cases to the exclusion of other classes, even though suits arising under such excluded cases might be surrounded by local prejudices and influences of such character and extent as to deprive defendant of a fair trial in the state courts); In re Vadner, 259 Fed. 614 (holding that the mere convenience of the parties and the avoidance of expense and litigation are not grounds of federal jurisdiction, authorizing the removal of a cause from a state to a federal court).

[a] Prescribing methods of procedure which defeat exercise of right.—A state cannot validly adopt a statute which will defeat a right of removal given by the federal laws by providing methods of procedure which will not afford litigants an opportunity of removal. [§ 5] 2. Waiver[42]—a. In General. A general engagement or agreement, made in advance of the existence of any controversy, not to remove into a court of the United States any suit or action which may be brought against the contracting party in the courts of a state is void.[43] A stipulation by a defendant in a particular suit, however, not to remove such suit is valid;[44] and the right to remove a particular suit may be waived by the conduct of defendant,[45] as where, in a cause the removability of which is then existing and apparent,[46] he proceeds with trial on the merits without applying for a removal,[47] or invokes or accepts the jurisdiction of the state court for affirmative relief[48] or relief beyond his strict legal rights;[49] or by failing to apply for removal within the time limited therefor by law.[50] The right is waived or suspended during the pendency of an appeal by defendant to a state appellate court, since the cause cannot be pending in two courts at the same time.[51] A defendant should not be deemed to have waived his right or be deprived there-

Wis.—Wadleigh v. Standard L., etc., Ins. Co., 76 Wis. 439, 45 NW 109.

"In the waiver of the right to resort to the Courts of the United States, in a particular case, only the private right of the individual is concerned. Its waiver touches no question of public policy. Its effectiveness stands upon the maxim, that any man may renounce a legal right which is conferred for his own advantage. The right in question may, therefore, be waived by any sufficient agreement of the party, as well by direct consent, as by that implied by the non-exercise of the right in the manner prescribed by law. A stipulation after suit commenced in the State Court would, I think, be, on the principles mentioned, a complete bar to the exercise of the right of removal; and, on the same ground, any conduct of the party which is equivalent to such a waiver ought to be enforced as such by the Court." [§ 7] D. As Dependent on Plaintiff's Pleadings. In general, the right to remove a cause from a court of a state to a federal court depends upon whether or not the allegations of plaintiff's petition or complaint bring it within the removal statutes,[83] except where there is a fraudulent joinder of defendants for the purpose of preventing removal,[84] and except as a suit not originally appearing to be removable may subsequently become or be shown to be so.[85] The right of removal must accordingly be determined from the facts as they appear from the pleadings at the time removal is sought,[86] and nothing occurring thereafter can add to or subtract from the right,[87] except, it has been held, that if plaintiff files an answer,[88] to a petition for removal[89] admitting allegations therein contained or alleging additional facts material to the question of removability, the facts so admitted or alleged are material.[90]

[§ 8] E. Second Removal. Where a suit removed from a state court to a federal court has been remanded thereby,[91] it cannot again be removed either upon the same[92] or a different[93] ground, unless the right to remove on such ground has appeared only since the time of the first removal.[94]

II. NATURE OF CAUSES REMOVABLE

[By Eustace W. Tomlinson]

[§ 9] A. Statutory Provisions. Under the statutes of the United States, as now in force,[95] the following classes of causes and proceedings may be removed from a state court, when brought therein, to a federal court, upon compliance with the provisions as to time[96] and manner[97] of removal: (1) Any suit of a civil nature, at law or in equity, arising under the constitution, laws or treaties of the United States, of which the district courts of the United States are given jurisdiction; and any other suit of a civil nature, at law or in equity, of which the district courts of the United States are given jurisdiction, where defendant is a nonresident of the state; and any suit in which there is a controversy between a citizen of the state in which the suit is brought and a citizen of another state, when it shall be made to appear that a defendant, being a citizen of another state, will not be able on account of prejudice or local influence to obtain justice in the state court; except that no case arising under the federal statutes relating to the liability of common carriers for injuries to employees shall be removed, and that no suit brought against a common carrier to recover damages for delay, loss of or injury to property received for transportation by it under the Interstate Commerce Act shall be removed where the matter in controversy does not exceed the sum or value of $3000;[98] (2) Any action in which the title of land is concerned, and the parties are citizens of the same state, and the matter in dispute exceeds the sum or value of $3000, where it is made to appear that a plaintiff or defendant claims or will rely upon a right or title under a grant from one state and an adverse party claims a right or title under a grant from another state;[99] (3) Any civil suit or criminal prosecution against any person who is denied or cannot enforce, in the tribunals of the state or of the part of the state where the suit or prosecution is pending, any right secured by any law providing for the equal civil rights of citizens or persons within the jurisdiction of the United States; or against any civil or military officer for any wrong committed by virtue or under color of any civil rights law, or for refusing to do any act on the ground that it would be inconsistent with such law;[1] (4) Any civil suit or criminal prosecution against any officer appointed or acting under any revenue law of the United States, or against any person acting under or by authority of such officer, on account of any act done under color of his office or of such law, or on account of any right, title or authority claimed by such officer or other person under such law; or commenced against any person holding property by title derived from any such officer, and affecting the validity of such revenue law; or against any officer of the courts of the United States for or on account of any act done under color of his office or in the performance of his official duties; or against any person on account of anything done by him while an officer of either house of congress in the discharge of his official duty in executing any order of such house;[2] (5) A personal action brought by an alien against any citizen who is or at the time of the accrual of the alleged cause of action was a civil officer of the United States and a nonresident of the state wherein jurisdiction is obtained by the state court by personal service of process;[3] and (6) Any civil or criminal prosecution commenced in any court of a state against any officer, soldier or other preson in the military service of the United States on account of any act done under color of his office or status, or in respect to which he claims any right, title or authority under any law of the United States respecting the military forces thereof, or under the law of war.[4]

[§ 10] B. As Dependent on Original Jurisdiction of Federal Courts. In order to be removable from a court of a state to a federal court because arising under the constitution or a law or treaty of the United States[5] or on account of diversity of citizenship,[6] an action or proceeding must in nature and substance be one over which the federal courts could have exercised jurisdiction if it had originally been brought therein;[7] and where the federal courts could not have taken jurisdiction of a cause originally, they cannot acquire jurisdiction on such grounds by waiver or consent of the parties to the removal of the cause.[8] Thus a federal statute providing that the courts of the United States shall not have jurisdiction of particular actions or proceedings necessarily implies that such a suit brought in a state court cannot be removed to a federal court.[9] In matters of form and procedure, however, the suit need not be such that the federal court could have taken original jurisdiction of it,[10] nor is it essential that the federal court shall be able to acquire original jurisdiction of a cause in the manner in which jurisdiction thereof was acquired by the state court;[11] and it is no objection to removal that the case involves claims and defenses in both law and equity, which cannot be united in a suit in the federal court.[12] The fact that plaintiff would have an adequate remedy at law does not prevent the removal of a suit in equity which is otherwise removable if no objection on that ground is made, although the equity suit would not originally have been maintainable in the federal court if the objection had been raised.[13]

Concurrent original jurisdiction. From the rule, as just stated, that a cause may be removed to a federal court on the grounds specified only if it could originally have been brought there,[14] considered in connection with the further rule prohibiting removal of causes of which the state court is without jurisdiction,[15] it necessarily results that the original jurisdiction of the federal courts must be concurrent with that of the state courts, and not exclusive thereof, in order to render the cause removable because involving a federal question or diversity of citizenship.[16]

Jurisdiction and venue distinguished. By a supposed application of the foregoing rule that a cause, in order to be removable from a state court to a federal court, must be one of which the federal court could have taken original jurisdiction if it has been brought therein,[17] it was formerly held by some courts that in order to be so removable the cause must be one of which original jurisdiction in invitum could have been taken by the particular federal district court to which removal is sought,[18] unless plaintiff consents and waives objection, in which case

Ralya Market Co. v. Armour, 102 Fed. 530. (4) A suit which is in form an action of trespass to try title, wherein plaintiff relies upon an equitable title, and not maintainable in the federal court at law because of the reliance upon the equitable title, and not in equity because no equitable relief is sought. the district court to which the cause has actually been removed is treated as having jurisdiction;[19] and so, in recognition of the rule, as elsewhere stated, that removal can be had, if at all, only to the district court of the district within which the cause is pending in a state court,[20] the conclusion has been reached that where the suit could not originally have been brought in such district, because of the nonresidence therein of plaintiff or defendant,[21] it is not removable at all, notwithstanding the existence of all the facts otherwise sufficient to render the cause removable.[22] It has been pointed out, however, that this view confuses jurisdiction with venue,[23] and that the rule restricting removability to those causes of which federal jurisdiction might originally have been taken refers only to the jurisdiction of the federal district courts generally, and not to the particular district court by which the jurisdiction may be exercised, as affected by the residence of the parties;[24] and it appears now to be settled that the provisions of the statutes relating to the place of bringing suit in the federal courts, as affected by the residences of the parties, have no bearing on the question of the removability of a suit,[25] but where upon its facts a cause is shown to be within the removal statutes it may be removed to the court of the proper district, regardless of the residences of the parties and regardless of whether or not the suit could originally have been brought in that district.[26]

In General. Broadly speaking, any suit at law or in equity is removable from a state court to a federal court when the requisite jurisdictional facts appear, whether it be an ordinary action or suit, or any other proceeding carried on in the ordinary judicial tribunals of the state by which an individual pursues a remedy which the law affords,[27] providing it has actually been brought[28] and has not been dismissed[29] nor the issues finally disposed of and final judgment rendered.[30] It is essential, however, to the removal of a cause other than a criminal prosecution that it be a suit or action, within the meaning of the law of the state in the courts of which it is brought, as distinguished from a mere administrative or other nonjudicial proceeding,[31] although a decision of the state court that a statutory proceeding is not a suit or action is not controlling on the federal court.[32] Thus a proceeding pending not in a court of justice, but before an administrative board or commission, is not a suit, so as to be removable as such,[33] although if the finding or decision of such board or commission is filed in or reported to a court having power to determine questions of law and fact, and in which there are parties litigant to contest the case on the one side and the other,[34] or an appeal is taken thereto,[35] it becomes a suit within the meaning of the removal statutes;[36] and it has been held that a petition of intervention merely filed in a pending action, under the practice prevailing in the state court, without service of notice or process, does not constitute a suit so as to render the matter removable.[37]

In what court brought. Since the statutes providing for the removal of causes from a state to a federal court make no distinction between superior and inferior courts, or between courts of record and not of record, or between courts of general and of limited jurisdiction,[38] an action instituted before a justice of the peace, clothed with judicial power to hear and determine cases and render judgments, is removable where the proper elements of federal jurisdiction are present.[39] A cause can be removed only from the court of original jurisdiction, and not from an appellate court.[40]

Mere fact that federal court acquired jurisdiction of res before state court, by reason of the commencement of a suit in the former court before the suit in the latter court was instituted, does not render removable the cause pending in the state court.[40½]

[§ 12] 2. Criminal Proceeding or Proceeding of Criminal Nature. A criminal prosecution may, of course, be removed from a court of a state to a federal court in the cases provided for by the removal statutes.[41] Obviously, however, under those provisions of such statutes referring only to civil suits and actions,[42] criminal prosecutions are not removable.[43] Moreover, a proceeding, although civil in form,[44] and even if declared by state statute to be a civil proceeding,[45] is not removable under the statutes relating to the removal of civil suits where it is in fact criminal in its nature,[46] as in the case of an action by a state or municipality or a public officer for the imposition or collection of a penalty,[47] an information in equity by a state attorney-general to enjoin the violation of an anti-trust law,[48] or an action on a recognizance for good behavior;[49] and the fact that it is joined with a count for damages will not render such a cause removable.[50] But not every proceeding founded upon a wrongful act or in which a penalty may be adjudged against defendant is for that reason unremovable under the statutory provisions applicable to civil suits:[51] thus a proceeding to recover punitive damages for a private wrong, under a statute providing for such recovery, is not unremovable as being penal in its nature;[52] nor is an action for damages for wrongful death,[53] even though the state statute creating the cause of action therefor provides also for the payment of a fine to the decedent's estate if the wrongdoer is convicted of crime in causing the death.[54]

Commencement. Until an indictment has been found or an information has been filed against a defendant, no criminal prosecution can be said to have been commenced, so as to be removable,[55] and so one merely arrested and held to await the action of the grand jury cannot remove the proceeding at that stage.[56]

[§ 13] 3. Quo Warranto.[57] An action in the nature of a quo warranto, even if it is begun by information, is to be regarded as a civil suit and may be removed from a state court to a federal court when it arises under the constitution or laws of the United States.[58]

[§ 14] 4. Mandamus. An original and independent action for a writ of mandamus, brought for the purpose of securing relief by such writ, is not a suit of a civil nature at law or in equity, within the meaning of the statutes authorizing the removal of such suits from a court of a state to a federal court.[59] Moreover, inasmuch as the inferior federal courts have no jurisdiction to issue the writ in an independent action,[60] such an action when brought in a state court is for that reason also not removable, notwithstanding diversity of citizenship or the existence of a federal question,[61] since the statutes authorize the removal in such cases of only those suits of which the federal courts are given jurisdiction.[62] The form of the action is not controlling, however, as to its removability, but the court must look beyond to its purpose,[63] and when a proceeding is in fact equitable, the circumstance that it is in form an action for mandamus will not prevent it from being removed;[64] but a mandamus action is not rendered removable because plaintiff applies therein for a temporary injunction as an ancillary remedy,[65] or applies for the appointment of a receiver in case the writ shall be violated.[66]

[§ 15] 5. Injunction. A suit for a mandatory injunction is one which is removable from a state court to a federal court, under the statutes providing for the removal of civil suits in equity, where the jurisdictional requisites are present.[67]

[§ 16] 6. Probate Proceeding—a. In General. An application for or resistance to the probate of a will is not a suit of a civil nature at law or in equity within the meaning of the statutes providing for the removal of such suits from a state court to a federal court,[68] and so is not removable, either originally[69] or on appeal.[70] Similarly, a proceeding in the court by which a will was admitted to probate, to set aside the probate thereof, cannot be removed.[71] A bill in equity, however, to establish a lost will,[72] or to annul a will as a muniment of title and to limit the operation of the decree admitting it to probate,[73] is a suit which may be removed where the jurisdictional facts exist.

[a] Rule applied.—(1) A proceeding in a probate court for the set-of the rule that a cause, to be removable, must be one of which the federal court could have taken original jurisdiction.[76] But an adversary proceeding which is otherwise within the scope of the statutes providing for removal is not rendered unremovable by reason of the fact that it is initiated in a probate court or is based upon rights in or claims against the estate of a decedent;[77] and a suit in equity to compel an executor to assent to a legacy to plaintiff is independent of and distinct from the administration of the estate and so is removable where the jurisdictional facts exist.[78]

[§ 18] 7. Suit for Divorce.[79] Inasmuch as the federal courts have no jurisdiction of suits for divorce,[80] such a suit cannot be removed from a state court to a federal court under the statutory provision authorizing the removal in certain cases of civil suits of which the federal courts are given jurisdiction.[81]

[§ 19] 8. Condemnation Proceeding. A judicial proceeding for the condemnation of land, instituted upon notice and in which interested parties are given an opportunity to oppose the taking, are removable from a state court to a federal court where the requisite difference of citizenship exists between the corporation or public agency for whose benefit the property is to be condemned and the respondent,[82] or when the proceeding arises under the constitution or laws of the United States;[83] and the existence of a controversy as to the right to condemn the lands, distinct from that as to the amount of damages to be awarded, does not prevent a removal,[84] nor does the fact that the removal of the condemnation suit and its trial in the federal court may have an indirect effect upon the proceedings as to other parties in the state court.[85] A condemnation proceeding brought by a state for its own benefit, however, is not removable on the ground of diversity of citizenship,[86] since a state is not a citizen within the meaning of the removal statutes.[87]

Appraisal and assessment of damages. A proceeding for the appointment of commissioners to appraise property to be taken by right of eminent domain, and to assess damages for the taking, is ordinarily a mere administrative proceeding and not a suit, and therefore not removable;[88] and, similarly, proceedings upon an application made to a state railroad or public utility commission for its consent to the condemnation of property are not removable.[89] If, however, the appointment of commissioners is made on notice, and an opportunity is given interested parties to oppose the condemnation, the proceeding is removable where the jurisdictional facts

[§ 20] 9. Action Arising under Federal Employers' Liability Act[94]

—a. In General. Under the express provisions of the statutes relating to the removal of causes from a state court to a federal court[95] and of the federal Employers' Liability Act,[96] no action arising under that act and brought in a state court of competent jurisdiction is removable to a federal court on any ground,[97] except when brought against a receiver appointed by a federal court to take charge of and operate the business of a carrier.[98] Although it has been held that the nonremovability of such actions is a privilege extended to plaintiff and so may be waived by him,[99] the better view appears to be that it is a positive prohibition or restriction upon the jurisdiction of the federal courts as a class, which cannot be waived by the parties.[1] Since the federal act is applicable only to common carriers by railroad, it does not prevent the removal of actions by or in behalf of employees of other persons or corporations although founded upon the negligence of a carrier.[2]

[a] Strict construction of statutes.—The provisions of the removal statutes and the Employers' Liability Act that no cause arising under such act shall be removable does not mean merely that a cause so arising shall not be removable because of having so arisen, but may be removable where any otherwise proper ground exists; rather, such statutory provisions prohibit the removal of such an action on any ground whatever, and the case against removability is even stronger since the adoption of the Judicial Code than it was before. De Atley v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 201 Fed. 591 [disappr Van Brimmer v. Texas, etc., R. Co., 190 Fed. 394]; Missouri, etc., R. Co. v. Bunkley, (Tex. Civ. A.) 153 SW 937.

[b] Even though cause is founded upon federal Safety Appliance Act (1) it is not removable where it is brought under the Employers' Liability Act. St. Louis, etc., R. Co. v. Hays, 136 Miss. 701, 101 S 548; St. Louis, etc., R. Co. v. Kirk, 136 Miss. 608, 101 S 377. (2) Removal of cause arising under federal laws in general see infra §§ 46-89.

[c] Plaintiff's pleadings as determining whether cause arises under the act.—(1) Whether a cause arises under the federal Employers' Liability Act, so as to be unremovable, ordinarily depends upon the allegations of plaintiff's petition or complaint. Boyle v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 42 F. (2d) 633; Geffers v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 25 F. (2d) 774; Reindahl v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 291 Fed. 924; Todd v. Chicago, etc., R. (2) And where a cause on the face of plaintiff's pleadings appears to have arisen under the act, defendant, by denying that it arose in interstate commerce, cannot raise an issue of fact which will render the suit removable. Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Hendrix, 169 Ark. 825, 277 SW 337 [certiorari den 270 U. S. 651, 46 SCt 351, 70 L. ed. 781]. (3) But if allegations as to injury in interstate commerce are fraudulently inserted for the purpose of defeating removal, they do not govern and the cause is removable if the other jurisdictional requisites exist. Boyle v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., supra; Farmers' Bank, etc., Co. v. Atchison, etc., R. Co., 25 F. (2d) 23 [rev 11 F. (2d) 993]. See Reindahl v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 291 Fed. 924; Todd v. Constitutionality of statutes. Inasmuch as the right of removal is purely statutory, and exists only where it has been conferred by congress,[3] there can be no question of the constitutionality of the provisions prohibiting the removal of actions arising under the Employers' Liability Act.[4]

[§ 21] b. Actions by Seamen. It appears to be well settled that an action for personal injuries, brought by a seaman against his employer under the statute permitting the bringing of such actions at law and providing that all statutes modifying or extending the common law right or remedy in cases of personal injury to railway employees shall apply,[5] cannot be removed from a state court to a federal court,[6] in view of the statutory provisions prohibiting the removal of actions arising under the federal Employers' Liability Act;[7] but there is some authority to the contrary.[8] An action not founded on negligence, however, is not unremovable because of such provisions;[9] nor is an action for injuries to one who is not a seaman, even though his employment has maritime relation.[10]

[§ 22] 10. Proceeding for Assessment or Collection of Tax. A judicial proceeding for the collection of a delinquent tax or assessment is a suit, and removable as such, under the statutes authorizing the removal of causes from a state court to a federal court, where the jurisdictional requisites appear.[11] It has been held that a statutory proceeding in a state court, instituted by a municipal corporation for the assessment of the cost of a public improvement upon the benefited property, is a mere administrative proceeding and not a suit, and so not removable;[12] but there is authority for the contrary view, where interested parties are given an opportunity to resist or remonstrate against the proposed assessment and to have a trial on the issues.[13] A proceeding inter partes in a court to which an fers v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 25 F. (2d) 774 (holding that, where the question whether the accident occurred in interstate commerce is doubtful, there can be no fraud in allegations that it did so occur). (4) And a mere allegation that the cause arose under the act does not prevent the removal of the action if the facts alleged do not show that it did so arise. Thomas v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 202 Fed. 766. See to same effect Connolly v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 3 F. (2d) 818; Chunes v. Duluth, etc., R. Co., 292 Fed. 153. But see De Atley v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 201 Fed. 591 (holding that a suit for injuries to a brakeman engaged in interstate commerce against a carrier will be regarded as having been brought under the act, so far as concerns its removability, where expressly based upon such act, although the negligence charged may not be covered by the act, or the facts alleged may not make out the negligence charged).

[d] Cause founded on common law, state statute, and federal act (1) constitutes but one cause of action, although based on several grounds of liability, and so arises under the federal act and is unremovable so long as plaintiff is relying thereon, although if he should abandon the theory that the case arose under the federal act or at the trial should fail to show a case within the act, his right of removal would be protected and preserved. Rice v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 203 Fed. 580. See Mitchell v. Southern R. Co., 247 Fed. 819; Jones v. Southern R. Co., 236 Fed. 584; Strother v. Union Pac. R. Co., 220 Fed. 731; Ullrich v. New York, etc., R. Co., 193 Fed. 768 (all to same effect). But see Givens v. Wight, 247 Fed. 233; Flas v. Illinois Cent. R. Co., 229 Fed. 319 (both holding that the action is not unremovable where causes arising under the state statute and under the federal act are set up in separate counts, although both are based upon the same injury). (2) Change in condition of cause as permitting removal although not originally removable see infra § 26.

[e] What is state court of competent jurisdiction.—Although the constitution and laws of a state provide for a verdict by less than the whole number of the jury, the court is "competent", within the meaning of the provision prohibiting removal of actions under the Employers' Liability Act when brought in a court of competent jurisdiction, since it is within the authority of each state to set up its own courts and prescribe the method of trial therein. Gibson v. Bellingham, etc., R. Co., 213 Fed. 488.

[f] Applicability of prohibition to actions on causes arising prior to its enactment.—(1) The provisions of Act of April 5, 1910, amending the Employers' Liability Act by prohibiting removal of causes arising thereunder from a state to a federal court, have been held to relate not to the right of action but merely to the remedy, and so to prevent the removal of an action arising under such act although it is founded upon a cause arising prior to the enactment of the amendment. Teel v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 204 Fed. 918, 123 CCA 240, 47 LRANS 21. (2) But there is authority for the contrary view. Ft. Smith, etc., R. Co. v. Blevins, 35 Okl. 378, 130 P 525.

assessment or determination of benefits has been reported by an administrative board or commission,[14] or to which an appeal from such determination has been taken and in which the matter is triable de novo,[15] is such a suit or judicial proceeding as to render the cause removable where the other elements of removability exist.

[§ 23] 11. Suit To Dissolve Corporation.[16] A suit by a stockholder to procure the dissolution of a corporation is a civil suit and removable as such from a state court to a federal court where the other jurisdictional elements are present.[17]

[§ 24] 12. Creditor's Suit or Similar Proceeding. A creditor's suit, founded upon a judgment of a state or federal court,[18] is such a suit as may be removed from a state court to a federal court where the requisite jurisdictional facts exist;[19] but a suit upon a claim which has not been reduced to judgment, although authorized by the state practice, is not removable,[20] since the federal court could not take original jurisdiction of such a suit, in view of the general rule making a judgment essential to the maintenance of a creditors' bill.[21] A bill in equity to enforce the lien of an attachment is removable, however, although plaintiff has merely a simple contract debt or a claim for unliquidated damages.[22]

[§ 25] 13. Ancillary Proceeding. A suit which is merely ancillary and supplemental to one previously brought in a state court, and which is so connected with the original suit as to be an incident thereto or substantially a continuation thereof, cannot be removed from a court of a state to a federal court, unless the original suit has been previously or is simultaneously removed.[23] The principle is inapplicable, however, to proceedings which are not strictly ancillary to other suits.[24]

Proceeding ancillary to suit in federal court. A proceeding brought and pending in a state court is not removable to a federal court merely on the ground that it is ancillary to a suit already pending there.[25]

[§ 26] D. Cause Subsequently Becoming Removable. It has sometimes been stated as a general rule that a cause which when commenced is not removable from a state court to a federal court, under the statutes providing for such removals, may afterward become so;[26] but this means only that a cause not removable at the time it is brought on account of the failure of jurisdictional facts to appear may thereafter be removed whenever it is made to appear that facts authorizing a removal existed at the commencement of the suit.[27] Thus a suit apparently not removable when commenced, under the rule that the removability of a cause at its commencement depends upon the allegations of the petition or complaint,[28] will become removable, where the requisite jurisdictional facts exist, if plaintiff fails to prove allegations which, if true, would force the retention of the cause in the state court or render it unremovable,[29] or abandons a theory of the cause under which it would be unremovable,[30] or by amendment of his pleadings brings the cause within one of the classes specified by the removal statutes,[31] or if the proof discloses that the cause is in fact within such statutes.[32] A change in extrinsic circumstances, however, after the institution of a suit will not make it removable;[33] and no proof offered or defense made by defendant,[34] even though upheld by the state supreme court,[35] and no order or decision of the state court upon any issue tried upon the merits,[36] can render a cause removable where it was not so originally.

[§ 27] E. Where State Court without Jurisdiction.[37] The jurisdiction of a federal court, upon removal of a cause from a state court, must rest upon that of the court from which the suit is removed.[38]

So a federal court cannot acquire jurisdiction by removal of proceedings of which the state court had no jurisdiction,[39] as where the cause is one of which the federal courts are given exclusive jurisdiction,[40] or one which is not within the limited jurisdiction of the state court in which it was brought,[41] or where after the institution of the suit it was held that the court in which it was brought had no legal existence;[42] and this is true even though the suit is one which might originally have been brought in the federal court.[43] The fact that defendant has not been served with process, however, does not prevent the removal of the cause by him, where valid process might issue from the state court.[44]

III. AMOUNT OR VALUE IN CONTROVERSY

[§ 28] A. In General. Inasmuch as the statute relating to the removal of civil suits from a court of a state to a federal court authorizes such removal only where the federal court could have taken original jurisdiction of the cause,[45] and since the federal district courts have, in general, jurisdiction of suits under the constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States, or between citizens of different states or citizens of a state and foreign states, citizens, or subjects, only where the matter in controversy exceeds a specified sum or value,[46] no such cause is removable on the ground of diversity of citizenship,[47] or because involving prejudice or local influence,[48] or because arising under the constitution, laws or treaties of the United States,[49] unless the matter in dispute exceeds the sum or value specified by the stat-

[a] Actions arising under revenue laws.—(1) While removal is authorized, regardless of the amount involved, of civil suits and criminal prosecutions against a revenue officer of the United States or against any person acting under the authority of such an officer on account of an act done under color of his office or of a revenue law, or against a person holding property by a title derived from such an officer, when the suit or prosecution affects the validity of any such revenue law, no other action arising under the revenue laws of the United States can be removed where the amount in dispute is below the amount specified by the general provisions of the statute. Ex p. Pennsylvania Co., 137 U. S. 451, 457, 11 SCt 141, 143, 34 L. ed. 738, 741; Johnson v. Wells, 98 Fed. 3; Johnson v. Wells, 91 Fed. 1; Tod v. Cleveland, etc., R.

ute;[50] and, by the express provisions of the statute, a cause involving grants of land from different states is removable only in a similar circumstance.[51] Where, however, a suit arising under the federal constitution or laws is one of which the federal courts are given jurisdiction without regard to the amount in controversy, and the removal statutes contain no provision as to such amount with respect thereto, it may be removed regardless of the sum or value involved.[52]

Statutory amount must be exceeded. Where the removability of a cause depends upon the amount in controversy, it must involve a sum or value in excess of the amount specified by the statute,[53] and a cause involving only the amount so specified is not removable.[54]

Preventing removal by limiting recovery prayed. By praying judgment or decree for a sum less than the jurisdictional amount, in a suit the removability of which depends upon the amount in controversy, plaintiff can prevent the removal of the suit even though the facts would support a prayer for a larger recovery.[55]

In General. In ascertaining whether or not a cause is removable from a court of a state to a federal court, the amount or value in dispute, where material, must be determined from the pleadings filed in the cause,[57] as they stand at the time of the application for removal;[58] so where the existence of the requisite amount or value does not appear therefrom it cannot be supplied by averments in the petition for removal[59] or by any pleadings filed after remov-

S. 529 mem, 29 SCt 695 mem, 53 L. ed. 1069 mem] (holding that in a suit in a state court for an injunction, based upon a law of the United States, where the value in controversy is not shown by the complainant's pleading, for the purpose of removal of the cause

al,[60] and, on the other hand, when plaintiff's bill or complaint indicates that the amount or value in dispute exceeds the jurisdictional amount the right of removal cannot be taken away by any showing on the part of defendant that a lesser amount is involved.[61] The jurisdiction is governed by the whole matter in controversy;[62] and all sums forming a part of the matter in dispute are to be considered.[63] Where relief is prayed in the alternative, it appears that that which involves the larger amount is the test of jurisdiction.[64] In accordance, however, with the general rule that removal cannot confer jurisdiction on a federal court where the state court had none,[65] the fact that the pleadings indicate that the controversy involves a sum or amount exceeding that required by statute will not authorize removal of the cause where the jurisdiction of the state court is limited to an amount less than the statutory minimum.[66]

Time of evaluation. Since a suit not originally removable cannot become so by any subsequent change in the facts and circumstances,[67] the sum or value in dispute must exceed the jurisdictional amount at the commencement of the suit, in order to render it removable.[68]

Value alleged by plaintiff's pleadings is ordinarily conclusive, in the absence of any contrary showing or any showing of fraud, where such value is not liquidated by law.[69]

[§ 30] 2. Pecuniary Standard. No suit or action, the removability of which from a state court to a federal court depends upon the existence of a matter in dispute exceeding the sum or value specified by the removal statutes, can be removed unless it involves a right or claim capable of pecuniary estimation or determination.[70] Thus a proceeding for a writ of habeas corpus,[71] an inquisition of lunacy,[72] or a suit to enforce an arbitration agreement,[73] is not removable; nor is a suit for divorce,[74] or a suit to set aside a decree of divorce,[75] even though plaintiff demands alimony and counsel fees, since the proceedings therefor are ancillary to the principal suit.[76]

[§ 31] 3. Contingent Loss or Damage. No contingent loss or damage which one of the parties may sustain by a decision against him is to be taken into consideration in the estimate of the value of the matter in dispute in a cause, as affecting its removability from a court of a state to a federal court.[77] Thus, the fact that, on account of its probative force, the judgment to be rendered may operate as an estoppel in a subsequent proceeding,[78] or that it may affect a party's rights against a stranger to the litigation,[79] does not increase the sum or value in controversy. Prospective damages which may be recoverable in the action, however, or which the bill is filed to prevent,[80] should be considered, provided they are alleged with sufficient certainty.[81]

ceeding the sum or value prescribed by the statutes authorizing the removal of causes from a court of a state to a federal court, interest accrued on the demand, and which is collectable only as an incident of the principal, is to be excluded from the estimate or computation.[82] But interest which is the subject of a separate contract, such as a coupon, and which might be the subject of a separate suit, is properly included;[83] so the face value of coupons due before the suit may be added to the principal named in the bond, in determining the jurisdictional amount,[84] except in the case of a coupon the nonpayment of which is the basis of a demand, under an acceleration clause, for the payment of a principal sum otherwise not yet matured.[85] Similarly, where the relief sought does not include interest as such, but a calculation of interest is used in ascertaining the amount of the demand, as in the case of damages for breach of warranty, such interest is a part of the jurisdictional amount.[86]

[§ 33] 5. Costs. Where the removability of a suit from a court of a state to a federal court depends upon the amount or value in controversy,[87] costs are not to be considered in estimating or computing such amount.[88] Thus notarial fees for the presentment and protest of a note in suit, although paid before the commencement of the action, are to be excluded from the computation of the jurisdictional amount, being costs and not damages.[89] But where an attorney's fee is provided for by statute, or is stipulated for in a contract or note, it is not costs but a part of the amount in controversy, and is properly included in the estimate thereof.[90]

[§ 34] 6. Counterclaims. Whether the amount of a counterclaim pleaded by defendant should be added to that of plaintiff's claim, to determine the amount or value in controversy in the suit, within the meaning of the statutes relating to the removal of causes from a state court to a federal court, has been the subject of conflicting adjudications,[91] some decisions being to the effect that a counterclaim should be included in the estimate or computation,[92] especially where, under the state statute, it would be barred unless pleaded in the suit,[93] and others that it should not be so included therein.[94]

[§ 35] 7. Defenses Apparent in Plaintiff's Pleading. The fact that plaintiff's own pleading shows a sufficient defense to part of his claim to reduce it below the amount prescribed by the statutes relating to the removal of causes from a court of a state to a federal court does not, in the absence of bad faith and where the claim is not purely fictitious, prevent the removal of the action.[95]

[§ 36] 8. Actions by or against Multiple Parties[96]—a. Multiple Plaintiffs or Plaintiff Representing Multiple Claimants. Where a number of plaintiffs, claiming under the same title, and having a joint or a common and undivided interest in the relief sought, unite in a suit, the adverse party having no interest in the apportionment or distribution of the amount recovered among them, the value of the matter in dispute, within the meaning of the statutes relating to the removal of causes from a state court to a federal court, is ordinarily to be regarded as the value of their united interests.[97] Similarly, where a suit is brought by one or more plaintiffs for themselves and all others of a class jointly interested in the relief sought, the aggregate interest of the whole class constitutes the matter in dispute.[98] Where, however, suit is brought by one on behalf of himself and of all others who may become plaintiffs, the cause is not removable where the amount or value of the relief sought by him does not exceed the jurisdictional amount and no other persons become plaintiffs, although the aggregate value of the relief to which all those similarly situated would be entitled is in excess of the amount specified by the statute;[99] and where, for convenience of litigation, two or more plaintiffs, having several and independent interests, unite in a single suit,[1] or one or more claimants having several and independent causes of action assign them to the holder of a similar claim to be sued upon in their behalf,[2] the suit is not removable except as to those parties whose claims, considered apart from the claims of others, exceed the amount prescribed by statute.[3]

[§ 37] b. Multiple Defendants. Where two or more defendants are joined in one suit, the removability thereof, so far as it depends upon the amount or value in controversy, within the statutory provisions relating to the removal of causes from a court of a state to a federal court, is ordinarily determined by the joint or several character of the defendants' liability.[4] If their liability is joint, the value of the matters in controversy between plaintiff and all the defendants is to be regarded as the matter in dispute.[5] But if their liability is several, the cause is ordinarily not removable except as to those defendants whose several liabilities or claims separately exceed the amount prescribed by the statute.[6]

[§ 38] 9. Amendment of Pleadings.[7] Where plaintiff, in a suit not originally removable from a state court to a federal court because the amount of or value in controversy does not exceed the sum prescribed by statute, so amends his pleadings as to increase such amount or value to a sum in excess of that specified by the statute, the cause thereupon becomes removable if the other jurisdictional requisites are present;[8] and, by the converse of this rule, a suit originally subject to removal becomes unremovable, so far as its removability depends upon the amount or value in controversy, where, before defendant's right to remove has been exercised, plaintiff, by amendment of his pleadings, reduces such amount or value below the sum specified by statute.[9]

[§ 39] 10. Consolidation of Causes. Where neither of two or more suits pending in a state court between the same parties is removable to a federal court because the matter in dispute does not exceed the amount or value prescribed by the removal statutes, the consolidation of such suits, so that the aggregate amount involved in the consolidated cause is in excess of that specified by the statutes, will not authorize removal.[10]

[§ 40] C. Particular Actions or Proceedings—1. Action for Damages. Where suit is brought upon a demand on which the law liquidates the damages for a default, the amount of the damages as liquidated by the law is the value of the matter in dispute, within the meaning the statutes relating to the removal of causes from a state court to a federal court, regardless of the amount named in plaintiff's declaration or petition.[11] In other actions for damages, however, the amount for which plaintiff demands judgment is to be regarded as the sum or value in dispute,[12] unless it clearly appears that the amount named is merely colorable, and beyond the amount of a reasonable expectation of recovery,[13] or unless the allegations of the complaint show affirmatively that plaintiff is entitled to recover a lesser sum only than that for which judgment is prayed;[14] and so where the complaint or declaration contains several counts or causes of action, the aggregate amount of the damages claimed is the value of the matter in dispute,[15] unless it appears that each is founded upon the same state of facts.[16]

Suit Involving Right or Title to Property. In a suit in which plaintiff's title to real estate is in issue, or in which he seeks to quiet his title or remove a cloud therefrom, the value of such title, and not the value of the right or interest claimed by defendant, is the amount or value in controversy, within the meaning of the statutes relating to the removal of causes from a court of a state to a federal court;[17] and, similarly, in an action or proceeding to recover personal property, the amount or value in controversy is the value of such property.[18] It has been held that where land has been put to a special use by defendant, its value to him as so used should control.[19]

In condemnation suit[20] the amount in controversy is the compensation to be allowed to defendant whose property is taken.[21]

moval of causes from a state court to a federal court where the amount or value in dispute exceeds a specified sum,[22] is the amount sought to be recovered through the lien.

[§ 43] 4. Suit for Injunction—a. In General. In a suit for an injunction, the amount or value in controversy, within the meaning of the statutes relating to the removal of causes from a state court to a federal court, is the value to plaintiff of the right for which he prays protection,[23] or the value to defendant of the acts which plaintiff seeks to restrain or prevent,[24] and not the amount of damage done to plaintiff.[25]

In action for damages and for injunction, the amount of damages claimed[26] and the value of the right involved in the injunction are to be added together in estimating or determining the amount or value in controversy.[27]

[§ 44] b. To Restrain Municipality from Issuing Bonds. Apparently in accordance with the general rule that the value to defendant of the acts which plaintiff in an injunction suit seeks to restrain or prevent is the amount or value in controversy, so far as concerns the right to remove the suit from a court of a state to a federal court,[28] it has been held that in a suit to enjoin a municipal corporation from issuing bonds, the amount in dispute is the total value or amount of the bonds proposed to be issued, and not the amount of the tax which might be assessed against plaintiff for the payment thereof.[29]

[§ 45] 5. Attachment Proceeding or Creditor's Suit. In a proceeding for an attachment,[30] or a creditor's suit,[31] the amount or value in controversy, within the meaning of the statutes relating to the removal of causes from a state court to a federal court, is the amount of plaintiff's claim, rather than the value of the property sought to be reached.

IV. SUITS ARISING UNDER CONSTITUTION, LAWS, AND TREATIES OF UNITED STATES[32]

[By William G. Bannon]

[§ 46] A. In General. The Removal Act of 1875 provided for the removal from the state to the federal court of any suit of a civil nature, at law or in equity, then pending or thereafter brought, where the matter in dispute exceeded, exclusive of costs, the sum or value of five hundred dollars, and arising under the constitution or laws of the United States, or treaties made, or which should be made, under their authority.[33] The Act of 1887-1888 in providing for the removal of suits arising under the constitution, laws or treaties of the United States omitted any specific reference to the value of the matter in controversy, specified the suits which could be removed as those of which the circuit courts of the United States were given original jurisdiction by the preceding section of the statute, and provided specifically for removal by defendant or defendants.[34] The general policy and effect of the latter Act, which, insofar as it affects the matters here considered, is substantially the same as the present Act,[35] was actually to contract the jurisdiction of the federal courts of first resort,[36] since after the enactment of the statute, in contrast with the practice under the act of 1875, the fact that a particular suit arose under the constitution, laws, or a treaty of the United States, must appear from the allegations of plaintiff's pleading[37] and plaintiff could not remove the suit.[38] Subsequent statutes have placed other limitations on the right to remove, as, for example, the statute expressly forbidding the removal of actions under the Federal Employers' Liability Act,[39] and the statute denying jurisdiction to the federal district courts, except as to one type of corporation, of any action by or against any corporation on the ground that it was incorporated by or under an act of congress.[40] Under the provision, here under consideration, of the present Removal Act, the suit must be one of a civil nature, at law or in equity,[41] of which the federal courts of first resort have original jurisdiction,[42] and, in general, in which the value of the matter in controversy required to give original jurisdiction, is present.[43] When the existence of a federal question through a claim of unconstitutionality determines the jurisdiction of the federal court, the same principles apply, whether the jurisdiction is invoked by original pleading or by removal petition.[44]

Decision as to all issues. Where the jurisdiction of the federal court properly attaches by removal, it extends to the whole case and to all the issues raised, whether federal or nonfederal,[45] and the federal court has power to decide all questions.[46]

Validity of statute. The constitutionality of statutes providing for the removal of suits arising under the constitution and laws of the United States has been upheld.[47]

[§ 47] B. What Constitutes Suit Arising under Constitution, Laws, or Treaty of United States—1. What Constitutes Law. The phrase "laws of the United States," as used in the Removal Act, has been construed as meaning Acts of congress[48] and as not including executive rules and regulations,[49] unless a recovery of damages is expressly authorized by statute for a disregard of such regulations,[50] or a presidential proclamation which is not authorized by congress.[51] There is authority for the view that where territory is ceded to the United States and the municipal law of the old sovereignty is continued in effect a case arising under such law arises under a law of the United States.[52]

[§ 48] 2. Decision Dependent on Construction of Constitution, Law, or Treaty.[53] It is generally recognized that a suit arises under the constitution, or a law, of the United States, or, as sometimes expressed, raises a federal question,[54] whenever its correct decision depends on the construction of such constitution or law,[55] or, as set forth in greater detail, in whole or in part, in some of the cases, if, from the questions involved in a suit, it appears that some title, right, privilege, or immunity, on which the recovery depends, will be defeated by one construction of the constitution or a law of the United States, or sustained by the opposite construction, the case is one arising under the constitution or laws of the United States, within the meaning of the Removal Act;[56] if the decision does not depend on the construction of the constitution, a law or a treaty of the United States, the suit is not removable on the ground here discussed,[57] merely because in the progress of the litigation it may be necessary to give a construction to the constitution or laws of the United States.[58] The right of removal does not depend upon the validity of the claim set up under the constitution or laws of the United States.[59] This rule which recognizes the dependence of the decision on the construction of the constitution or a law of the United States as a ground for removal, must be considered in connection with the rules, under the present Removal Act, that the ground for removal must appear from the allegations of plaintiff's pleading[60] and that the right to remove may not be based on any defense which defendant may interpose.[61]

[§ 49] 3. Controversy as to Construction; Question Previously Decided.[62] It has frequently been held or asserted that a suit does not arise under the constitution, laws, or a treaty of the United States where there is not a real and substantial[63] dispute or controversy as to the construction or effect of such constitution, laws, or treaty,[64] that where the decision depends entirely on a determination as to the facts,[65] or as to general law,[66] the suit is not removable, and that these rules apply even where plaintiff's claim is based on a federal statute.[67] The view has been expressed, however, that the jurisdiction of the federal court on removal does not depend upon whether on the trial of the case a controversy will actually arise as to the effect or construction of the constitution or a law of the United States,[68] in view of the facts that the question as to whether the suit arises under the constitution or law of the United States is to be determined from the plaintiff's pleading alone, and that the question whether the case will actually involve such controversy is not determinable from such pleading alone.[69] Moreover, it has been asserted that the statement as to the necessity for a real and substantial controversy has usually been made in cases in which the right asserted in plaintiff's pleading was not a right created by a federal law,[70] and there is authority for the view that whenever a federal law grants a right of property or of action and a suit is brought to enforce that right, such a suit arises under the law creating the right within the meaning of the Removal Act,[71] even though the particular suit may turn upon questions of fact.[72] In any event there have been cases in which the Supreme Court of the United States has recognized the right to remove although apparently a controversy as to the construction or effect of the federal statute on which plaintiff's action was based was not necessarily involved.[73]

Question previously decided. The view has frequently been expressed that where a question has once been determined by the supreme court of the United States it ceases to be a federal question,[74] since there is no longer a substantial controversy as to the statute involved,[75] and that a suit, the decision in which depends on the answer to such question is not removable on the ground here considered.[76] This view has not, however, been accepted without reservation,[77] and it has been held that in any event the right of removal of a suit involving a federal question is not affected by the fact that the supreme court has laid down in previous decisions on entirely different states of facts general principles which will probably control the decision.[78] A suit does not arise under the laws of the United States simply because the supreme court, or any other court, has decided in another suit the questions of law which are involved.[79]

[§ 50] 4. Claim of Plaintiff and Defense.[80] The view has been expressed that in order that a suit may be removable as arising under the constitution, laws, or a treaty of the United States, it must appear that plaintiff seeks to enforce a right,[81] title, privilege, or immunity[82] given him by such constitution, laws, or treaty, or that his cause of action is based on such constitution, laws, or a treaty.[83] In any event in view of the rule that the ground for removal here discussed must appear from the allegations of plaintiff's pleading,[84] the rule under the present Removal Act, in contrast with the rule under the act of 1875,[85] is that the right to remove cannot be based on any defense which defendant may interpose.[86]

[§ 51] 5. Suit Involving State Constitution or Statute.[87] It is the general, if not the universal, rule under the present Removal Act that if plaintiff's cause of action is based solely on a constitutional or statutory provision of a state,[88] or, if the decision is dependent on the construction of such provision,[89] the suit is not removable on the ground here considered; as, for example, a suit based on the alleged violation of a constitutional or statutory provision of a state,[90] even though a defense set up arises out of, or is based on, the constitution or laws of the United States.[91]

[a] Based on defense.—Under the Removal Act of 1875 (1) a suit arose under the constitution of the United States when a defense was asserted under any provision of such constitution. Southern Pac. R. Co. v. California, 118 U. S. 109, 6 SCt 993, 30 L. ed. 103; Mahin v. Preiffer, 27 Fed. 892; Kessinger v. Hinkhouse, 27 Fed. 883; San Mateo County v. Southern Pac. R. Co., 13 Fed. 145. See Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Wiggins Ferry Co., 108 U. S. 18, 1 SCt 614, 27 L. ed. 636 [aff 11 Fed. 381, 3 McCrary 609] (where, however, an order for remand was affirmed in a case in which defendant claimed that the courts of one state had not given full faith and credit to the public acts of another state in rendering a certain judgment which was set up by plaintiff by way of estoppel). Compare Germania Ins. Co. v. Wisconsin, 119 U. S. 473, 7 SCt 260, 30 L. ed. 461 (where the federal question based on constitutional provisions did not appear). (2) Likewise a suit arose under a statute of the United States when a defense was asserted under such statute. Ames v. Kansas, 111 U. S. 449, 4 SCt 437, 28 L. ed. 482; New Orleans, etc., R. Co. v. Mississippi, 102 U. S. 135, 26 L. ed. 96; Willard v. Mueller, 23 Fed. 209; Houser v. Clayton, 12 F. Cas. No. 6,739, 3 Woods 273. (3) The rule as to a suit arising under the constitution was applied where defendant asserted that certain provisions of the state constitution were discriminatory and violative of the Fourteenth Amendment. San Mateo County v. Southern Pac. R. Co., 13 Fed. 145. (4) So the rule was applied where defendant alleged that a state statute violated a provision of the federal constitution. Illinois v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 16 Fed. 706.

Co., 255 Fed. 369 (where remand was directed). But see Minnesota v. Duluth, etc., R. Co., 87 Fed. 497 (where a motion to remand was denied). (2) The rule has also been applied in the case of an alleged impairment of a contract in violation of the federal constitution. Georgia v. Southern R. Co., 255 Fed. 369; State v. Columbia R., etc., Co., 112 S. C. 528, 100 SE 355. See Georgia v. Southern R. Co., 255 Fed. 369 (where remand was directed). But see Minnesota v. Duluth, etc., R. Co., 87 Fed. 497 (where a motion to remand was denied).

[b] Effect of defendant's petition in bankruptcy.—A person sued in a state court cannot, by filing a voluntary petition in bankruptcy and being adjudged a bankrupt, cause the suits against him to be removed to a federal court. In re Vadner, 259 Fed. 614.

[c] Insufficient service on foreign corporation.—The provision of the Removal Act here under consideration does not give a foreign corporation defendant the right to remove a suit of which the federal court would not have had original jurisdiction, for the sole purpose of having that court determine, as a federal question, that the service made did not give the state court jurisdiction. Conques v. Louisiana Western R. Co., 4 F. (2d) 611.

[d] Question as to unreasonable or arbitrary character of regulation promulgated by state commission.—(1) The justness and feasibility of railroad regulations made by the state corporation commission are reviewable only by the state tribunals, and not by the federal courts, unless the regulations are so unreasonable or arbitrary as to violate the protective clauses of the fourteenth amendment of the constitution, when they may be reviewed only by the supreme court of the United States on a writ of error after the railroad company has exhausted its right of review afforded by the laws of the state and a proceeding to enforce such regulations is not removable. North Carolina Corp. Commn. v. Southern R. Co., 151 N. C. 447, 66 SE 427. (2) The fact that compliance with an order of the state corporation commission, requiring removal of its freight station in a city, would cost defendant more than two thousand dollars did not per se make the regulation an infraction of the Fourteenth Amendment of the federal constitution, so as to confer jurisdiction on the inferior federal courts to review such order on removal. North Carolina Corp. Commn. v. Southern R. Co., supra.

[e] The contrary view was apparently taken in some cases, although in some instances a conclusion not violative of the rule may have been reached. Illinois v. Rock Island, etc., Co., 71 Fed. 753; South Carolina v. Port Royal, etc., R. Co., 56 Fed. 333; Lowry v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 46 Fed. 83; Fitzgerald v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 45 Fed. 812; Illinois v. Louisville Bridge Co., 42 Fed. 241 (where a motion to remand was granted in a case in which there had been no legislative action looking to the impairment of the contract which alleged impairment was relied on as a defense).

[a] Forfeiture of property rights.—(1) A state's action to obtain a judgment of forfeiture of defendants' rights in a canal because of noncompliance with conditions subsequent of a grant conveying rights, defended on the ground that the statute declaring a forfeiture and authorizing an action to recover possession was unconstitutional, was properly brought in a state court, and application for removal to the United States District

[§ 52] 6. Presence of Questions in Addition to Federal Question. The existence in the case of other questions than that arising under the constitution or laws of the United States does not defeat the right of removal,[92] and where the jurisdiction of the federal court does properly attach by removal, it extends to the whole case and to all of the issues raised, whether federal or nonfederal.[93]

[§ 53] C. Removability of Suits by State in General.[94] The federal constitution does not exempt the state as plaintiff from the operation of the provision of the Removal Act under consideration[95] and an action by the state in one of its own courts is removable in a proper case if it arises under the Constitution, a law, or a treaty of the United States.[96] It seems, however, that, in view of the rule, under the present Removal Act, that the fact that a suit so arises must appear from the allegations of plaintiff's pleading,[97] and that the right to remove for that reason may not be based on any defense which defendant may interpose,[98] suits by the state are not often removable.[99]

[§ 54] D. Removability of Suits Involving Particular Matters or Persons[1]—1. Patents, Copyrights, and Trade-Marks. In view of the statutory provision making the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States in all cases arising under the patent and copyright laws exclusive of the courts of the several states,[2] and the rule that a federal court cannot acquire jurisdiction by removal of a proceeding of which the state court had no jurisdiction,[3] there is authority for the view that a federal court cannot acquire jurisdiction by removal of a particular suit, on the ground that it arises under the patent or copyright laws of the United States.[4] The federal court has however retained jurisdiction, after removal, of a complaint setting up several causes of action where one of such causes is one arising under the patent laws,[5] as, for example, a suit treated as one for the infringement of a patent.[6] Further, a suit to enjoin defendant from making the allegedly false assertion that plaintiff is selling an article which is an infringement of defendant's patented article has been retained where by such suit it is evidently the purpose to obtain an adjudication of the respective rights of the parties;[7] and a like rule has been recognized in respect of a suit to join the infringement of a registered trade-mark and for an accounting.[8] In any event, where the action or suit, involving in some respects a patent or copyright, raises no question as to the validity or infringement of the patent or copyright, ordinarily it is not removable as arising under the laws of the United States,[9] as, for example, a suit to compel the assignment of a copyright on the

(2) The right to remove was denied in the case of a proceeding to test title to a public office, which proceeding the incumbent sought to remove on allegations that the returning officers of election declared the incumbent elected because certain duly qualified voters were wrongfully prevented from voting for incumbent. Georgia v. Southern R. Co., 255 Fed. 369.

[b] Even under the Removal Act of 1875 a suit did not arise under the constitution or laws of the United States merely because it involved the construction of a statute of another state. Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Wiggins Ferry Co., 108 U. S. 18, 1 SCt 614, 617, 27 L. ed. 636.

[§ 55] 2. Public Lands, Mining, and Water Rights.[13] Under general rules and subject to applicable qualifications and limitations[14] a suit involving federal public land[15] or mining[16] laws, may be a suit arising under the laws of the United States within the meaning of the Removal Act. Where, however, there is no dispute or controversy as to the effect or construction of the constitution, laws, or a treaty of the United States, the case is not removable on the ground under consideration,[17] even though plaintiff sets up title based on a patent from the United States.[18] Thus it has been held or recognized that a suit is not removable where the decision depends only on the construction or effect of a state statute or other local enactment,[19] custom,[20] or decision of court;[21] or on the location of boundary lines described in a federal land grant or patent.[22]

[b] Proceeding to determine rights as to mining claim.—An action brought pursuant to U. S. Rev. St. § 2326, to determine the better right to the possession of a mining claim is not necessarily removable. Mountain View Min., etc., Co. v. McFadden, 180 U. S. 533, 21 SCt 488, 45 L. ed. 656; Larned v. Jenkins, 109 Fed. 100, 48 CCA 252.

[c] Meaning of mining terms.—The right of removal has been denied where the decision depends solely on the (1) meaning of terms used in the federal mining laws (Blue Bird Min. Co. v. Largey, 49 Fed. 289), (2) such as "vein," "lode" or "ledge" (Blue Bird Min. Co. v. Largey, supra), (3) "top" or "apex" of a vein (Blue Bird Min. Co. v. Largey, supra).

S. 226, 18 SCt 603, 42 L. ed. 1017.

[b] Title arising under municipal ordinance.—A suit to quiet title to lands claimed by plaintiff as beneficiary of a grant to the city of San Francisco by Act of Congress of July 1, 1864, 13 St. 333 § 5, did not arise under the laws of the United States but under municipal ordinances, as ratified by the legislature, which were referred to in such act of congress. [a] Suit to prevent issuance of securities.—Where a suit was brought to enjoin a railroad company from issuing equipment trust bonds, on the defense under the commerce clause of the federal constitution,[27] under statutes regulating interstate commerce,[28] or under other statutes regulating commerce,[29] is not of itself sufficient ground for removal.

[§ 57] b. Monopolies. Subject to applicable limitations and qualifications[30] the removability, on the ground here under consideration, of certain suits based on, or to enforce, the federal anti-trust statute has been recognized,[31] even where the state court did not have jurisdiction of the suit,[32] or where the question as to the right of plaintiff to maintain the action was involved.[33] It has been held, however, that the federal court should not have retained, after removal, jurisdiction of a suit brought by a state to declare void a contract on the ground that it violated the federal anti-trust law,[34] as the suit was not maintainable, since it was not one of the methods specified in such federal act, for its enforcement.[35] So, the removability, on the ground here under consideration, of a suit to recover penalties under a state anti-monopoly statute,[36] or otherwise to enforce such a statute,[37] has been denied.

[§ 58] c. Shipments of Goods.[38] Under general rules and subject to applicable limitations and qualifications,[39] the right to remove, as arising under laws of the United States, has been recognized or upheld in the case of actions against railroad companies for injury to, or loss of, property shipped by rail in interstate commerce,[40] of actions based on excess theory that the issue would constitute a violation of a provision of the state charter of the railroad company prohibiting it from becoming guarantor for other corporations, and that the proposed securities had not been authorized by the State Railroad Commission, and the only reference found in the petition to any federal law is the statement that the action sought to be enjoined was to be taken subject to approval of the securities by the Interstate Commerce Commission, such suit was not a suit "arising under" federal laws, and hence should be remanded to the state court. [b] Removal Act of 1875.—An action by a state to recover from a foreign corporation certain statutory penalties for doing business in such state without complying with state laws in reference to foreign corporations, was not removable in view of the fact that, on the condition of the record, defenses based on the federal constitution, including the commerce clause, could not be considered. Co., 71 Fed. 753 (where remand of a mandamus proceeding to compel defendant railroad company to run its trains to a certain station as required by a state statute, in which proceeding defendant maintained that such requirement was a substantial burden on interstate commerce, was denied); South Carolina v. Port Royal, etc., R. Co., 56 Fed. 333 (where apparently a defense was considered).

[a] Enforcement of order of state commission.—(1) A claim by an interstate railroad company that an order of the railroad commission, sought to be enforced against it, was an unreasonable interference with interstate commerce, was not a ground for removal, as arising out of the constitution and laws of the United States. State v. Louisville, etc., R. Co., 104 Miss. 413, 61 S 425. (2) That an order of the state corporation commission, directing a railroad company to remove its station from one side of its main line to the other, constituted an invasion of interstate commerce, and as such might be declared void by the supreme court of the United States on a writ of error, did not confer any jurisdiction on the inferior federal courts to pass on such question on removal of a proceeding to enforce such order. freight charges for interstate shipments,[41] of actions based on delay in furnishing cars for interstate shipments,[42] and of actions in which recovery of attorney's fees in connection with the violation of duty by an interstate carrier by railroad is sought.[43] But the right to remove on the ground here under consideration has been denied in the case of an action based on a contract between a railroad company and defendant by which defendant assumed liability for the damage involved, notwithstanding the railroad company's liability was fixed by a federal statute,[44] and also in the case of an action for damages brought under a state statute.[45]

[§ 59] d. Personal Injuries.[46] Prior to the amendment of 1910 prohibiting the removal of cases arising under the Federal Employers' Liability Act,[47] the removability of cases based on such act,[48] or on the Federal Safety Appliance Act,[49] was recognized or upheld in several cases, but in other cases it was held that the action did not arise under a law of the United States, in the sense that the phrase is used in the Removal Act, merely because plaintiff was entitled to relief under the Federal Employers' Liability Act or the Safety Appliance Act,[50] and that where there was no controversy as to the construction of the act in question,[51] or as to what law was applicable to the case,[52] the action was not removable. Where an action for an injury to the employee of a railroad company is one at common law,[53] or is based on a state statute[54] or where a proceeding for an injury to a person working on a floating dry dock is brought under a state workmen's compensation act,[55] the cause is not removable on the ground here under consideration.

[§ 60] e. Obstruction and Use of Navigable Waters.[56] Under general rules and subject to applicable limitations and qualifications[57] a suit involving navigable waters may be removable on the ground here under consideration[58] as, for example, a suit by a state to compel the removal of an obstruction upon a navigable stream, on the theory that the obstruction was maintained in violation of a provision of the enabling act of the state,[59] and a suit by the people of a state to enforce an alleged right, based ultimately on federal statutes, to have a sufficient flow of water to maintain the waters of a canal at a certain level has been held to be removable.[60] A suit involving navigable waters is not removable, however, as one arising under the constitution or laws of the United States merely because it is subject to

Co., 209 Fed. 895 (an action against a railroad company to recover for loss or damage to an interstate shipment through the alleged negligence of defendant is not one arising under any law of the United States); Orr v. Baltimore, etc., R. Co., 83 Misc. 221, 145 NYS 378 (an action under the Carmack Amendment to the Interstate Commerce Act against an interstate carrier for damages for loss of merchandise was not removable, where the only question for determination was one of fact). (2) The rule permitting removal has been applied to actions for loss of, or injury to, live stock. Hartford F. Ins. Co. v. Kansas City, etc., R. Co., 251 Fed. 332; Smith v. Atchison, etc., R. Co., 210 Fed. 988; McGoon v. Northern Pac. R. Co., 204 Fed. 998. (3) The rule permitting removal has been applied to actions against the initial carrier (McGoon v. Northern Pac. R. Co., 204 Fed. 998; Missouri, etc., R. Co. v. Smith, (Tex. Civ. A.) 164 SW 885), (4) against the connecting carrier (Great Northern R. Co. v. Galbreath Cattle Co., 271 U. S. 99, 46 SCt 439, 70 L. ed. 854 [rev 66 Mont. 198, 213 P 610, 71 Mont. 56, 227 P 65]; Missouri, etc., R. Co. v. Miller, (Tex. Civ. A.) 211 SW 543), (5) and against the initial carrier and connecting carrier jointly (Alabama Great Southern R. Co. v. American Cotton Oil Co., 229 Fed. 11, 143 CCA 313. But see Adams v. Chicago Great Western R. Co., 210 Fed. 362 [an action against several carriers engaged in an interstate shipment of wool, on the ground that the terminal carrier failed to deliver the same, did not arise under a law of the United States because the initial carrier was made liable for the default of any connecting carrier by Carmack Amend. § 7]). (6) Thus the rule permitting removal applies to an action against the initial carrier for loss or injury to live stock. Southern Pac. Co. v. Stewart, 245 U. S. 359, 562, 38 SCt 130, 203, 62 L. ed. 345. (7) So an action against a second and connecting carrier for injuries to cattle due to delay, careless handling, and failure to comply with duty as to unloading cattle into properly equipped pens for rest, water, and feeding, is removable. Great Northern R. Co. v. Galbreath Cattle Co., 271 U. S. 99, 46 SCt 439, 70 L. ed. 854 [rev 66 Mont. 198, 213 P 610, 71 Mont. 56, 227 P 65]. (8) Although an interstate shipment was stopped in transit and rebilled, without being repossessed, as an intrastate shipment in the state of destination, to original destination, an action for damage to such shipment was removable. a defense based on such constitution or law,[61] or where plaintiff's claim is based solely on state laws[62] or on a colonial charter which was confirmed by the state.[63]

[§ 61] 4. Revenue and Taxation.[64] The removability of a suit arising under a federal statute providing for internal revenue has been recognized.[65] However, in view of the rule, under the present Removal Act, that the fact that the suit arises under the constitution or laws of the United States must appear from the allegations of plaintiff's pleading,[66] a suit by a state to recover taxes[67] or penalties,[68] levied under its own revenue laws, or a suit by county authorities to collect taxes levied under a state statute,[69] is not removable on the ground here under consideration, notwithstanding defendant interposes a defense based on the constitution or laws of the United States.[70] Under the Removal Act of 1875 the question as to the right of plaintiff[71] to remove a suit or proceeding involving taxes or revenue arose in various instances.[72]

[§ 62] 5. Postal Laws. Subject to applicable limitations and qualifications[73] the removability of actions arising under the postal laws has been recognized.[74]

[§ 63] 6. Indians. Subject to applicable limitations and exceptions[75] the removability of a suit arising under federal laws applicable to the status and rights of Indians has been recognized,[76] but an action in the nature of ejectment brought by an Indian was not removable merely because a defense arising under a federal law might be interposed.[77]

[§ 64] 7. Officers or Agents of United States, and Persons Claiming under Such Officers or Agents[78]—a. In General. In the absence of special authorization[79] the mere fact that defendant is an officer of the United States,[80] or that the action is between Dalles, etc., Ferry Co. v. Hendryx, 189 Fed. 266. (2) So removability has been denied in the case of a suit by a city to prevent defendant railroad company from constructing or maintaining a bridge except a bridge meeting certain requirements was not removable because it was subject to defenses based on the commerce clause of the federal constitution and on the provisions of federal statutes applicable to the construction, maintenance, and operation of bridges over navigable streams. [a] Suit on proceeding not removable.—(1) Plaintiff's right to remove an action to recover back, under a state statute, the amount of taxes erroneously levied and collected, on the ground that it involved a federal question, was denied (Berger v. Douglas County Comrs., 5 Fed. 23), (2) notwithstanding a federal court has made a decree establishing the invalidity of the taxes in question (Berger v. Douglas County Comrs., supra). (3) Where the petitioner in a proceeding under Virginia act of Jan. 14, 1882, for the identification and verification of bond coupons tendered in payment of taxes, debts, or demands due the state, claimed the right to removal under the Removal Act of 1875, it was held that the proceeding was not a suit of a civil nature arising under the constitution or laws of the United States within the meaning of the act. such an officer and his deputy,[81] is not ground for removal. It has, however, been held or recognized that suits against officers of the United States based on acts done by virtue of or under color of their office arise under the laws of the United States and may be removed,[82] as, for example, suits or actions for damages[83] or to enjoin the performance of certain acts connected with the office.[84] In any event, in order that a suit against an officer of the United States may be removable on the ground here under consideration, the fact that it arises under the constitution or laws of the United States must appear on the face of plaintiff's pleading,[85] and the right to remove may not be based on a defense so arising.[86]

Actions against private persons. The mere fact that a private person has acquired property through an act of an officer of the United States does not render removable an action against such person, in which plaintiff seeks to establish certain rights in respect of such property,[87] but it has been held that an action based on the alleged fact that defendant wrongfully caused a United States marshal to levy execution on plaintiff's property, was one arising under the constitution or laws of the United States.[88]

[§ 65] b. Director General of, or Government Agent for, Railroads.[89] The removability of certain actions against the director general of railroads[90] and against the agent subsequently designated by the president to be sued in respect of causes of action arising during operation by the government,[91] including certain actions for personal injuries against the director general[92] or against the designated agent,[93] has been denied because of the prohibition in the act, under which the government took over the operation of the railroads during the Great War,[94] that there shall not be transferred to a fed-

St. at L. 756 c 81 § 5]).

[a] Suit to determine water rights.—(1) A suit against the secretary of the interior and others to determine the rights of plaintiff and defendant in a certain river has been held removable on the theory that the secretary's rights, as representative of the United States, depended on certain federal statutes. North Side Canal Co. v. Twin Falls Canal Co., 12 F. (2d) 311. (2) The use of the word "control" in the provision of the Reclamation Act of June 17, 1902 (32 St. at L. 390 § 8) disclaiming any intent to affect or interfere with state laws relating to the "control," etc., of water used in irrigation does not warrant the inference that congress intended to relegate a suit against the United States or the secretary of the interior involving a right, title, or interest of the United States, to the state court for determination and to deny the right of removal. North Side Canal Co. v. Twin Falls Canal Co., supra.

[83] See cases infra this note.

[a] United States marshals.—The removability of certain actions against United States marshals has been upheld or recognized, as for example: (1) Actions for wrongful levy upon property. Bock v. Perkins, 139 U. S. 628, 11 SCt 677, 35 L. ed. 314 [aff 28 Fed. 123]; Ellis v. Norton, 16 Fed. 4, 4 Woods 399; Howard v. Stewart, 34 Nebr. 765, 52 NW 714. But see McKee v. Coffin, 66 Tex. 304, 1 SW 276 (holding that a suit against a marshal for a levy upon goods which, it is claimed, belonged to some one other than the person named in the writ, was not removable). (2) Action to make a United States marshal liable for the acts of his deputy. Ellis v. Norton, 16 Fed. 4, 4 Woods 399. (3) Action for false imprisonment. Wood v. Drake, 70 Fed. 881.

[b] United States district attorney.—An action against a United States district attorney for malicious prosecution has been held removable. Eighmy v. Poucher, 83 Fed. 855.

[c] Warden of United States prison.—A prisoner's action against the warden of a United States penitentiary for injuries from alleged negligence in placing plaintiff in a dangerous position for work arose under the United States laws, so as to be removable. Steele v. Halligan, 229 Fed. 1011.

[d] Manager of reclamation project.—An action against the project manager for the United States of a reclamation project to recover damages for his alleged negligence while acting in his representative capacity presumptively involved a federal question and the case was removable. Whiffin v. Cole, 264 Fed. 252.

[84] See cases infra this note.

[a] United States marshal.—Where a United States marshal in his official capacity levied on real estate under an execution issued out of the federal court, an injunction issued by a state court restraining the marshal from proceeding further under the writ was removable to the United States Circuit Court as a case arising under the laws of the United States, though the marshal was joined as a defendant with one over whom jurisdiction was dependent on other considerations. Frank v. Leopold, etc., Co., 169 Fed. 922.

[b] Secretary of war.—A suit to enjoin the secretary of war and others from certain acts in respect of laying out a highway and constructing a bridge, after condemnation in a federal district court, under an act of congress, of a right of way across a highway, for a feeder of a canal, was held removable. Woods v. Root, 123 Fed. 402, 59 CCA 206.

[c] Postal officials.—The removability of certain suits to enjoin postal officials has been recognized or upheld, as, for example: (1) Suit to enjoin postmaster from refusing the use of the mails. New Orleans Nat. Bank v. Merchant, 18 Fed. 841. (2) Suit to enjoin a postmaster from giving effect to a fraud order. Bryant Bros. Co. v. Robinson, 149 Fed. 321, 79 CCA 259. (3) Suit to enjoin the postmaster-general from forbidding the transmission of a magazine through the mails as second class matter. Lewis Pub. Co. v. Wyman, 152 Fed. 200. (4) Suit to enjoin a postal inspector from delivering to a third person certain government property in the possession of plaintiff who claimed to be the regular incumbent of the office of postmaster. eral court any action which was not transferable prior to the federal control[95] but the removability of an action against the director general for injury to live stock during transportation in interstate commerce has apparently been recognized.[96]

[§ 66] c. Receivers for, or Agents for Stockholders of, National Banks.[97] It is usually recognized that a suit by[98] or against[99] the receiver of a national bank appointed by the controller of the currency arises under the laws of the United States and may be removed by defendant, and some of the recent cases rely on the statute giving jurisdiction to federal courts of cases for winding up the affairs of the bank[1] as ground for the removal of cases both against receivers[2] and also against agents appointed by shareholders of the bank in pursuance of the applicable federal statutes.[3] But it has been held that a suit against the receiver to recover certain moneys on the theory that they constitute a trust fund for plaintiff is not removable.[4]

[§ 67] 8. Receivers Appointed by Federal Courts.[5] The fact that the appointment of a receiver for a corporation was made by a federal court does not of itself make all actions by[6] or against[7] such a receiver a suit arising under the constitution or laws of the United States when the appointment was made under the general equity powers of the court; nor, does the rule permitting the removal of actions against officers of the United States because of acts performed under color of office or in the performance of their duties[8] apply.[9] It has been held, however, that where the validity of an order under which the defendant receiver was acting is brought in question the suit is removable.[10] Under a statute providing in substance for the removal of actions against any officer appointed by federal courts based on acts done by such officer under color of his office or in the performance of his official duties, certain actions against receivers appointed by federal courts are removable.[11]

But see Van Wert County Comrs. v. Peirce, 90 Fed. 764 (where the right to remove was upheld).

[a] Action for personal injury based on negligence.—A suit against a receiver appointed by a federal court to recover damages for his negligence or that of his employees does not necessarily arise under the laws of the United States. Gableman v. Peoria, etc., R. Co., 179 U. S. 335, 21 SCt 171, 45 L. ed. 220, 101 Fed. 1, 41 CCA 160; Chesapeake, etc., R. Co. v. Smith, 42 SW 538, 19 KyL 1826. But see Pitkin v. Cowen, 91 Fed. 599; Ray v. Peirce, 81 Fed. 881 (in both cases, however, remand was granted because of lack of the jurisdictional amount).

[b] Suit to forfeit franchise.—(1) An action by the people of the state of New York against certain street railroad companies in New York City to forfeit their franchises, granted by the common council of the city pursuant to legislative authority, was not removable to the federal courts on the theory that it arose under the Constitution and laws of the United States by reason of the fact that receivers appointed by the federal court to which removal was sought were in possession of the property, rights, and privileges of a lessee of the property of the companies whose franchises were sought to be forfeited. New York v. Bleecker St., etc., R. Co., 178 Fed. 156. (2) In such case that no consent had been obtained to sue the receivers or that the suit was prematurely brought, did not warrant a removal of the cause to the federal court. New York v. Bleecker St., etc., R. Co., supra.

[c] Interference with receiver's operation of railroad.—Where receivers of an interstate railroad were appointed by a federal court, actions against them instituted by claimants in a state court were not removable to the federal court on the theory that to permit such suits to be maintained in the state court would interfere with the receivers' operation of the road and their performance of its duties to the public since the court which appoints a receiver has power to protect the integrity of the railroad and to maintain its ability to perform its functions as an interstate carrier. Dale v. Smith, 182 Fed. 360.

[d] Receiver for a corporation organized under laws of the United States (1) might, it seems, remove an action against him because the corporation might have removed because of its federal incorporation. Reed v. Northern Pac. R. Co., 86 Fed. 817. (2) However, any right of a receiver in this regard would seem to have ceased in view of the statute denying in practically all cases the right of a corporation to remove on the ground indicated. See USCA tit 28 § 42; and infra § 69.

[e] Joinder of other defendants.—The right to remove has also been denied where the receiver was joined as defendant with another who did not have the right to remove. Rupp v. Wheeling, etc., R. Co., 121 Fed. 825, 58 CCA 161; Marrs v. Felton, 102 Fed. 775; Schearman v. Trumbell, 75 Fed. 33. But see Landers v. Felton, 73 Fed. 311 (where the court upheld the right of the receiver to remove on the theory that the case arose under the laws and constitution of the United States).

[a] Right to remove as affected by relief obtainable in federal court.—A federal receiver may be restrained as well in a federal court as in a state court from doing acts beyond his power, or the power of the court to direct, and hence the removal to a federal court of a suit to restrain him from doing such acts cannot be objected to on the ground that adequate relief cannot be had in that court. State v. Frost, 113 Wis. 623, 89 NW 915.

[§ 68] 9. Trustees in Bankruptcy.[12] In the absence of statute, a suit by[13] or against[14] a trustee in bankruptcy is not removable merely because of his status as trustee; nor, it seems, is an action against him removable under the rule heretofore stated[15] permitting the removal of certain actions against officers of the United States.[16]

[§ 69] 10. Corporations Organized under Laws of United States, Officers of Such Corporations, and Persons Claiming under Such Corporations[17]—a. In General. While in the absence of any statutory provision to the contrary it would seem that an action by or against a corporation organized under an act of congress would be removable under the provision of the Removal Act authorizing the removal of suits arising under the constitution or laws of the United States,[18] national banks are by statute excepted from the operation of the rule,[19] and it seems that at the present time most suits by or against a corporation organized under laws of the United States are not removable on the ground of such organization because of the statute limiting the original jurisdiction of federal district courts by providing that no such court shall have jurisdiction of any action or suit by or against any corporation on the ground that it was incorporated by or under an act of congress,[20] except in respect of corporations in which the United States is the owner of more than one-half the capital stock.[21]

(3) The acts of congress of June 20, 1878 and August 2, 1882, conferring certain rights and privileges on certain corporations organized under the laws of a state and of certain territories could not be considered the basis for removal of an action against a corporation operating in a state other than the one first referred to, where the above acts of congress did not confer powers or rights to be exercised outside the territories named therein. [20] USCA tit 28 § 42. See Leather Mfrs. Nat. Bank v. Cooper, 120 U. S. 778, 7 SCt 777, 30 L. ed. 816 (as to the effect generally on right to remove, of statutory provision denying original jurisdiction to federal court).

[a] Earlier statute applicable to railroad companies.—(1) The act of Congress of January 28, 1915 [38 U. S.

The purchaser at a foreclosure sale of the property of a railroad company organized under the laws of the United States, who assumes as part of the purchase price all liabilities incurred by the receivers in the foreclosure proceedings, does not represent such railroad company or the receivers so as to be entitled to assert a right of removal which such company and its receivers might have had because of their status.[22]

[§ 70] b. National Banking Associations.[23] Regardless of the general prohibitory statute referred to above,[24] by virtue of the statute providing that national banking associations shall, for the purposes of actions by or against them, and of all suits in equity, other than actions or suits enumerated, be deemed citizens of the state in which they are located,[25] actions by[26] or against[27] national banks are not removable merely on the ground of federal incorporation. The provision of such statute which gives jurisdiction to federal district courts of cases for the winding up of the affairs of national banks[28] does not render removable an action against the bank alone to establish the existence and validity of a claim against it,[29] or to compel a reconveyance of real estate;[30] but the rule is otherwise where the bank and its receiver are joined as parties defendant.[31] There is authority for the view that an action to set aside a proceeding by which it was sought to liquidate and dissolve a national bank is based on applicable federal laws and is, therefore, removable.[32]

Suits against officers and directors. An action against the officers and directors of a national bank by one who has had dealings with the bank based on the acts or representations of defendants in connection with the affairs of the bank, has been regarded as a suit arising under the banking laws on the theory that plaintiff sought to enforce the liability of defendants under a specific provision of such laws.[33]

[§ 71] c. Federal Reserve Banks. The above statute limiting the right of removal of actions to which national banking associations are parties[34] does not apply to federal reserve banks,[35] and it was held that under the general rule permitting the removal of cases to which corporations organized under the laws of the United States were parties,[36] actions against such banks were removable,[37] but it would seem that the rule permitting removal on the ground of federal incorporation has been abolished by the recent statute as to the jurisdiction of the federal district court of actions to which federal corporations are parties.[38]

[§ 72] d. Emergency Fleet Corporation.[39] Under the rule permitting removal of suits against corporations organized under laws of the United States, as suits arising under such laws, the removability of suits against the Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation has been recognized,[40] and this right to remove would seem to be saved by the express ex-

[b] Organization under laws of District of Columbia.—"In pursuance thereof [Act Sept. 7, 1916 (39 U. S. St. at L. 728)], and so authorized thereby, the Shipping Board incorporated the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation, under the general incorporation laws of the District of Columbia. These laws were adopted by act of Congress. The organization and incorporation were, therefore, not only in pursuance of a law of Congress expressly authorizing the same, but in pursuance also of an incorporation statute provided by Congress. Nothing is plainer than that the defendant is a corporation of the United States." Rosenberg v. U. S. Ship-

ception from the above described statute,[41] of actions by or against a corporation of which the government of the United States shall be the owner of one half of the capital stock[42] in view of the fact that the shipping board is the owner of not less than the majority of the stock of the Emergency Fleet Corporation.[43] While it has been held that various actions against such corporation are removable on the ground that they arose under a law regulating commerce,[44] there is authority for the view that an action for a personal tort against such corporation does not arise under any law regulating commerce so as to render it removable on that ground.[45]

[§ 73] 11. Judicial and Official Bonds. Actions on bonds required by federal courts pursuant to a federal statute,[46] and on bonds required by federal statute of certain officers as a qualification for office,[47] have been regarded as actions arising under the laws of the United States within the meaning of the Removal Act. On the other hand the right of sureties on the bond of a receiver appointed by a federal court to remove, on the ground under consideration, an action against them, to which the receiver was not a party has been denied, where the receiver's liability had already been determined in the federal court.[48]

[§ 74] 12. Suits Involving Litigation in Federal Courts. It has been held or recognized that a suit does not arise under the laws of the United States merely because it is brought on a judgment of a federal court,[49] because it becomes necessary to construe orders and decrees of a federal court according to their plain meaning,[50] because a party claims title under a sale made under an order, judgment, or decree of a federal court, when the validity and construction of that order, judgment, or decree is not in question;[51] or because a federal court has decided in another suit the questions of law which are involved.[52] A like rule has been applied where the alleged federal question arises out of what is in effect a plea of res judicata by defendant,[53] or where the decision depends on state laws.[54] In some cases, however, it has been held or recognized that a suit in which there is an attack on a decree or judgment of a federal court,[55] on the proceedings under, or for the enforcement of, such decree,[56] or on a title acquired under such decree or judgment[57] may raise a question under the laws or constitution of the United States within the meaning of the Removal Act.

[§ 75] E. Pleading Affecting Removability—1. In General. Under the Removal Act of 1875[58] the court was not confined to the allegations of plaintiff's initial pleading in determining whether the suit arose under the constitutions, laws or treaties of the United States,[59] and might consider the pleading of defendant[60] and the petition for removal.[61] On the

[a] Reason for rule.—"Even under the act of 1875, the jurisdiction of the circuit court of the United States could not be sustained over a suit originally brought in that court, upon the ground that the suit was one arising under the constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States, unless that appeared in the plaintiff's statement of his own claim. . . . The same rule applies, more comprehensively, to [§ 1 of] the acts of 1887 and 1888. . . . But the corresponding clause in section 2 [of the acts of 1887 and 1888] allows removals from a state court to be made only by defendants, and of suits 'of which the circuit courts of the United States are given original jurisdiction by the preceding section;' thus limiting the jurisdiction of a circuit court of the United States on removal by the defendant, under this section, to such suits as might have been brought in that court by the plaintiff under the first section." Compare Steele v. Halligan, 229 Fed. 1011 (where the court said that the rule that before the cause is removable plaintiff's statement of the cause of action must show it to be based on the laws or Constitution of the United States is applicable rather to provisions of the Constitution and laws in effect throughout the United States than to laws depending for their effect upon the territorial jurisdiction, as in the case of reservations and sites purchased for federal purposes and uses).

And see cases infra notes 71–78.

[a] Inconsistency between relief sought and constitutional or statutory provisions.—Even though a bill should show on its face that the relief sought would be inconsistent with the constitution or some law of the United States, such fact would only demonstrate that the bill could not be maintained at all, and not that the cause of action arose under the constitution or laws of the United States. Co., 87 Fed. 497 (where remand was denied).

[b] Pleading not disclosing federal question.—Complaints merely seeking to obtain a divorce, and to recover alimony, money had and received, money due on a judgment for separate maintenance, and the cancellation of conveyances as fraudulent, did not disclose a right of removal on the ground that a federal question was involved. S. 276, 38 SCt 237, 62 L. ed. 713 (in the absence of a fraudulent purpose to defeat removal, plaintiff may by the allegations of his complaint determine the status with respect to removability). But see People's U. S. Bank v. Goodwin, 160 Fed. 727 (where, however, the allegations, which it was claimed were fraudulently omitted, would merely have anticipated a defense); Winters v. Drake, 102 Fed. 545 (where a motion to remand was denied); Shohoney v. Quincy, etc., R. Co., 223 Mo. 649, 122 SW 1025 (where the court cited Colorado Cent. Cons. Min. Co. v. Turck, 150 U. S. 138, 143, 14 SCt 35, 37 L. ed. 1030 in which the present Removal Act was not under consideration); Masters v. Traders' Nat. Bank, 129 Misc. 133, 220 NYS 499 [aff 223 NYS 889] (court will scrutinize a complaint to see that plaintiff has not purposely omitted or misstated a fact bearing upon the right of removal).

[a] Where a complaint states a cause of action and is not subject to demurrer, plaintiff may not justly be charged with a fraud because of the omission of allegations which would plaintiff's pleading does not disclose a removable suit, the suit may not be rendered removable by allegations in subsequent pleadings,[72] including the answer or plea,[73] demurrer of defendant,[74] or a reply;[75] by the allegations of the petition for removal;[76] by evidence of defendant;[77] or by an order of the court upon any issue tried upon the merits.[78]

Several causes of action. If one of several causes of action set up by plaintiff arises under the constitution or laws of the United States, the fact that other causes do not so arise will not prevent removal.[79]

[§ 76] 2. Form and Sufficiency, Matters Considered, and Construction of Pleading. Plaintiff's pleading must disclose by a statement of facts in legal and logical form, such as is required in good pleading, that the suit arises under the constitution, laws or a treaty of the United States, in order to permit a removal on the ground here under consideration.[80] Thus it has been laid down that the fact that the suit so arises must be disclosed by plaintiff's pleading clearly and distinctly,[81] and by direct and positive averment,[82] and that it is not sufficient if the fact that the suit so arises appears only by inference.[83] So the view has been expressed that the question is to be determined from the material or necessary allegations of the complaint[84] without regard to statements which are merely surplusage in so far as the cause of action is concerned[85] as, for example, conclusions of law.[86] The question whether plaintiff claims a right under the constitution or laws of the United States is to be ascertained by the legal construction of his own allegations and not by the effect attributed to such allegations by the adverse party.[87]

Reference to particular law. The omission from plaintiff's pleading of a specific reference to any law of the United States does not prevent removal where the allegations of such pleading show that the suit arises under a law of the United States.[88]

Controversy as to construction or effect of constitution, law or treaty. It has been laid down in cases in which plaintiff's pleading was under consideration, that it must appear that the suit does really and substantially involve a dispute or controversy[89] as to a right which depends on the construction of the constitution, a law, or a treaty of the United States,[90] but this rule has been criticized in so far as it requires a disclosure by plaintiff's pleading of a dispute or controversy as to the construction of the constitution, law, or treaty,[91] and there are cases in the United States supreme court, in which the right to remove is recognized although apparently plaintiff's pleading did not necessarily disclose that there was such a dispute or controversy.[92]

Anticipating defense based on constitution, law, or treaty.[93] The suit is not rendered removable by allegations in plaintiff's initial pleading in anticipation,[94] or denial or avoidance,[95] of a defense based on the constitution, a law, or a treaty of the United States. Conversely plaintiff's anticipatory attempt to meet a possible defense will not defeat the right to remove.[96]

Whole pleading and attached documents considered. In determining whether a suit arises under the laws of the United States plaintiff's pleading is to be considered as a whole,[97] including attached documents and exhibits where they constitute a part of such pleading.[98]

Prayer for relief. While the prayer for relief may be considered in determining whether or not the suit arises under the constitution or laws of the United States[99] it has been held that a prayer, which, when considered alone, may be broader in its demands than is warranted by allegations in the body of the bill or complaint, must be construed in connection with, and must be limited by, such allegations.[1]

Judicial notice.[2] The omission from the complaint of matters of which judicial notice must be taken does not prevent the removal, even though such matters are a necessary element of a showing that the case arises under the constitution, laws, or a treaty of the United States,[3] but it seems that the court cannot take judicial notice of matters on which plaintiff does not choose to rely in the statement of his claim in his pleading, in order to work out the right to remove,[4] nor can such right be worked out by judicial knowledge of what the finally controlling laws may be.[5]

[§ 77] 3. Amendments. A case not removable under the original complaint may subsequently become removable where by amendment the complaint presents a case arising under the constitution or laws of the United States,[6] but there is authority for the view that an amendment made in the federal court cannot be given effect.[7]

S. 239, 20 SCt 867, 44 L. ed. 1052 (while court said record must show the existence of dispute or controversy, it was giving application to the rule that the question as to whether the suit arose under the constitution or laws of the United States depended on plaintiff's statement of his own case); Leggett v. Great Northern R. Co., 180 Fed. 314; Nelson v. Southern R. Co., 172 Fed. 478; Beck v. Johnson, 169 Fed. 154. See Spencer v. Duplan Silk Co., 191 U. S. 526, 24 SCt 174, 48 L. ed. 287 (where court emphasized the fact that plaintiff's declaration set forth no matter raising any controversy under the constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States). Compare Bowers v. First Nat. Bank, 190 Fed. 676 (where the view was expressed that it was sufficient if the existence of the controversy could be raised by demurrer).

[91] See McGoon v. Northern Pac. R. Co., 204 Fed. 998, 1003, 1004.

"It must be entirely plain that the plaintiff by his statement of his own cause of action cannot show whether the defendant will take issue as to matters of fact or matters of law, and it is therefore impossible for the plaintiff to show by his complaint that the case will 'really and necessarily involve a dispute or controversy as to a right which depends on the construction of the Constitution or some law or treaty of the United States.' . . . What, then, do the courts mean when they say that the construction of federal law must be involved in order to confer this jurisdiction? Certainly not that the case will necessarily turn upon an interpretation of the statute, but simply that the complaint must set forth a cause of action of which federal law is an essential ingredient, and which may, therefore, properly involve a construction of that law." [§ 78] 4. Pleadings in Suits Involving Particular Matters or Persons[8]—a. Patents and Copyrights. In accordance with the general rule[9] the question as to whether a suit arises under the copyright or patent laws is determinable from the allegations of plaintiff's pleading.[10]

[§ 79] b. Public Lands, Mining, and Water Rights.[11] The general rule that the question as to whether a suit arises under the constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States is determinable from the allegations of plaintiff's pleading[12] has been applied in cases involving public lands, or what were public lands, of the United States,[13] including mineral lands.[14] In determining that a suit was removable the court has taken judicial notice of certain matters not pleaded by plaintiff[15] but an action in support of an adverse claim to an application for a patent to a mining claim may not be rendered removable by judicial notice of facts which plaintiff did not choose to rely on in his pleading to support his claim.[16]

[§ 80] c. Commerce or Trade and Navigable Waters[17]—(1) In General. In accordance with the general rule[18] whether a suit is one arising under the provisions of the constitution or laws of the United States in respect of commerce or trade is determinable from the allegations of plaintiff's pleading,[19] and where such pleading does not disclose a case so arising, it is not removable on the ground here considered,[20] even though, for the purpose of preventing removal, plaintiff omits from his pleading a reference to interstate commerce.[21] The mere fact that plaintiff's complaint shows that defendant is engaged in interstate commerce is not sufficient to show that the suit arises under the constitution or law of the United States.[22] The omission from plaintiff's pleading, however, of a reference to a specific federal statute applicable to commerce or trade does not prevent a removal where the allegations contained in such pleading show that the suit arises under such a statute.[23] The rule making the determination of the question dependent on the allegations of plaintiff's pleading has been applied in suits to recover damages based on the loss of, or injury to, property shipped by railroad in interstate commerce,[24] to recover for excess charges on shipments in interstate commerce;[25] to recover for injuries to servants or employees of defendant,[26] and to enforce or to assert rights under the federal statutes aimed at restraint of trade.[27]

[c] Condemnation of right of way along railroad right of way.—Petition by a telegraph company under a state statute, for condemnation of a right of way along the right of way of a railroad company within the state did not present a federal question so as to permit removal because the proposed condemnation might interfere with interstate commerce and might involve an interference with navigable waters of the United States within its jurisdiction. [d] Effect of remarks by appellate court.—Where the supreme court construed the complaint in an action against the carrier for the death of a passenger and held that it did not present a federal question under the Hepburn Act (Act June 29, 1906, c 3591 § 1 par 4, 34 Stat. 584), as the complaint did not show on its face that deceased's right to transportation was derived from the federal statute, or that his cause of action was based on such statute, a further remark by the court that under the allegations of the complaint it did not constitute a fatal variance under the state statute for plaintiff to prove that deceased was a gratuitous passenger at the time of the accident was insufficient to negative the construction made by the court, and to introduce a federal question into the cause. Schuyler v. Southern Pac. Co., 37 Utah 612, 109 P 1025 [aff 227 U. S. 601, 33 SCt 277, 57 L. ed. 662, 43 LRANS 901].

[§ 81] (2) Obstruction and Use of Navigable Waters. The general rule that the question as to whether a suit arises under the constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States is determinable from the allegations of plaintiff's pleading[28] applies in cases involving the obstruction or use of navigable waters.[29] In determining that a suit to enforce certain claims as to navigable waters was not removable on the allegations of plaintiff's pleading the prayer for relief was considered in connection with the allegations in the body of the pleading and was limited accordingly.[30]

[§ 82] d. Revenue and Taxation.[31] The general rule that the question as to whether a suit arises under the constitution, laws or treaties of the United States is determinable from the allegations of plaintiff's pleading,[32] has been applied in determining that an action by a state,[33] or by officers of a county,[34] to enforce the collection of taxes or to recover penalties, imposed by state laws, was not removable on the ground under consideration.

[§ 83] e. Postal Laws.[35] The general rule that the question as to whether a suit arises under the constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States is determinable from the allegations of plaintiff's pleading[36] has been applied where the postal laws were involved.[37]

[§ 84] f. Indians.[38] The general rule that the question as to whether a suit arises under the constitution, laws, or a treaty of the United States is determinable from the allegations of plaintiff's pleadin,[39] has been applied where actions were brought by Indians.[40]

Officers or Agents of United States. Notwithstanding the rule permitting the removal of actions against officers of the United States under certain circumstances[41] under the general rule[42] a case is not removable on the ground here under consideration where on the face of the complaint there is nothing to show that the controversy was one arising under the laws of the United States,[43] as, for example, where, in an action based on a tort, there is nothing to show that defendant is an officer of the United States or that, in respect of the matters complained of, he had acted as such officer or under color of office.[44] Where, however, the complaint contained an allegation that defendant occupied a certain office of the United States during the time covered by the complaint, the right to remove was upheld.[45]

[§ 86] h. Receivers Appointed by Federal Courts.[46] The general rule that the question as to whether a suit arises under the constitution, laws, or a treaty of the United States is determinable from the allegations of plaintiff's pleading,[47] has been applied in denying the removability of certain actions against receivers appointed by federal courts.[48]

[§ 87] i. Trustees in Bankruptcy.[49] The general rule that the question as to whether a suit arises under the constitution, laws, or a treaty of the United States is determinable from the allegations of plaintiff's pleading,[50] has been applied in determining as to the removability of an action to which a trustee in bankruptcy was a party.[51]

[§ 88] j. Corporations Organized under Laws of United States, and Officers of Such Corporations.[52] Where the right to remove depends on the fact that defendant was a corporation organized under the laws of the United States, which right is now considerably curtailed,[53] the general rule requiring that the fact that the suit arises under the constitution, laws, or a treaty of the United States must appear from plaintiff's statement of his case,[54] may in certain aspects be regarded as qualified;[55] in any event the omission from plaintiff's pleading of an averment of the fact of federal incorporation,[56] or an erroneous statement of incorporation under state laws,[57] does not defeat the right to remove, since the court will take judicial notice of the fact of federal incorporation,[58] and, in this connection, consideration has even been given to defendant's petition for removal.[59]

National banking associations. As already pointed out the mere fact that a suit is by or against a national banking association does not render such suit removable as arising under the constitution or laws of the United States,[60] and the general rule that the question as to whether a suit arises under the constitution, laws, or a treaty of the United States is determinable from the allegations of plaintiff's pleading,[61] has been applied in actions to which national banks[62] or directors or officers of national banks[63] were parties.

V. SUITS AND PROSECUTIONS AGAINST CERTAIN OFFICERS OR PERSONS ACTING OR CLAIMING UNDER SUCH OFFICERS; PERSONS IN MILITARY SERVICE[66]

[BY WILLIAM G. BANNON]

[§ 90] A. Revenue or Prohibition Officers, and Persons Acting or Claiming under Such Officers—1. In General. By statute,[67] any civil suit[68] or criminal prosecution[69] commenced in any court of a state against any officer[70] appointed under or acting by authority of any revenue law[71] of the United States, or against any person[72] acting under or by authority of any such officer, on account of any act[73] done under color of his office or of any such law, or on account of any right, title, or authority claimed by such officer or other person, under any such law, or is commenced against any person holding property or estate by title derived from any such officer and affects the validity of any such revenue law, may at any time before the trial or final hearing thereof[74] be removed for trial[75] into the district court next to be holden in the district where the same is pending[76] upon the petition[77] of such defendant[78] in the manner specified.[79] By a provision of the National Prohibition Act the benefit of this removal statute is extended to prohibition officers or agents engaged in the enforcement of such act and it seems, to persons acting under the authority and direction of such officers or agents in such enforcement.[80]

Discretion of federal court as to taking jurisdiction. The federal court has no discretion to refuse to take jurisdiction where the facts found bring the matter within the terms of the statute.[81]

[§ 91] 2. Validity, Construction, and Operation of Statute in General. The constitutionality of the removal statute here under consideration,[82] including the provision for removal of criminal prosecutions,[83] such as prosecutions against prohibition officers or agents,[84] has been recognized or upheld under the constitutional provision[85] that the judicial power of the United States shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under the constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made or which shall be made under their authority.[86] There is authority for the view that the statute should be liberally construed in favor of removal,[87] but it should not be extended to give jurisdiction where jurisdiction does not appear to have been intended,[88] and it has been

[a] History of statute.—(1) The provision of the U. S. Revised Statutes dealing with the matter in question was substantially the same as the present statutory provision. Rev. St. § 643. (2) Still earlier statutes contained similar provisions. Act July 13, 1866 [14 U. S. St. at L. p 171 c 184 § 67]; Act June 30, 1864 [13 U. S. St. at L. p 241 c 173 § 50]; Act March 2, 1833 [4 U. S. St. at L. p 633 c 57 § 3]. (3) "Section 33 [of the Judicial Code, now USCA tit 28 § 76] was derived from section 643 of the Revised Statutes, which in turn was derived from the Act of July 13, 1866, 14 Stat. 171, c. 184, § 67, and the Act of June 30, 1864, 13 Stat. 241, c. 173, § 50. These acts extend the Act of March 2, 1833, Stat. 633, c. 57, § 3, applying to officers engaged in collection of customs duties to those engaged in the collection of internal revenue." Maryland v. Soper, 270 U. S. 9, 46 SCt 185, 190, 70 L. ed. 449. (4) The provisions of Rev. St. § 643 were not repealed by the Removal Act of 1875. Venable v. Richards, 105 U. S. 636, 26 L. ed. 1196 [aff 28 F. Cas. No. 16,913, 1 Hughes 326]. (5) For other details as to the history of the statute see Maryland v. Soper, 270 U. S. 9, 46 SCt 185, 70 L. ed. 449; Tennessee v. Davis, 100 U. [b] Suits or proceedings involving elective franchise.—(1) The Revised Statutes and a still earlier statute contained also a provision, not contained in the present statute, giving the right to remove to officers or persons acting under statutory provisions relating to the elective franchise. U. S. Rev. St. § 643; Act Febr. 28, 1871 [16 U. S. St. at L. p 438 c 99 § 16]. (2) Prosecution held not removable under such statute see Illinois v. Fletcher, 22 Fed. 776; Ex p. Anderson, 1 F. Cas. No. 349, 3 Woods 124. (3) Provision repealed. Act Febr. 8, 1894 [28 U. S. St. at L. p 36 c 25].

[a] Mr. Chief Justice Taft has said that: "The constitutional validity of the section rests on the right and power of the United States to secure the efficient execution of its laws and to prevent interference therewith, due to possible local prejudice, by state prosecutions instituted against federal officers in enforcing such laws, by removal of the prosecutions to a federal court to avoid the effect of such prejudice." asserted that where the question as to jurisdiction is doubtful the doubt should be resolved against the jurisdiction of the federal court.[89] Although the earlier statute,[90] from which the removal statute in question derives, was enacted because of attempts of one of the states to nullify a tariff act,[91] the statute as amended and extended is not limited to the removal of cases arising out of attempts by state legislatures to nullify laws of the United States.[92]

[§ 92] 3. What Are Revenue Laws. It has been said that the phrase "revenue law of the United States," as used in the statute in question is comprehensive[93] and that it includes any law under which the government may derive from any source funds to carry on its activities;[94] but the phrase does not include all laws appropriating money for the expenditure of revenue.[95]

Particular laws. Among other laws which have been regarded as revenue laws within the purview of the statute are a statute imposing a direct tax on the state[96] and the statute forbidding the fermenting of mash or wort or the making of spirits therefrom in any other than a distillery authorized by law, or by a duly authorized distiller.[97] So too, postal laws have been regarded as within the purview of the statute,[98] although there is apparently authority for the view that every statute regulating the postal service is not necessarily a revenue law.[99] Among other laws which, it has been held or recognized, are not revenue laws within the meaning of the statute are the reclamation act,[1] naval appropriation act,[2] and the statute prohibiting the importation of opium for other than medicinal purposes.[3] It has been held or recognized that the National Prohibition Act is not a "revenue act" within the meaning of the removal statute,[4] but there is authority to the contrary;[5] in any event prohibition officers or agents are entitled to the benefit of the removal statute in question on a different theory.[6]

[§ 93] 4. What Acts Included—a. In General. The statute does not include an act of an officer which is not done in the performance of his official duties, or under the color of his office.[7] So in order that a prosecution may be removed as having been instituted "on account of" acts done by defendant as a federal officer under color of his office or of the revenue or prohibition law, there must be causal connection between what the officer has done under asserted official authority and the state prosecution,[8] and it must appear that the prosecution has arisen out of the acts done by him under color of federal authority and in enforcement of federal law.[9] The statute does not, however, require that the proceeding against him must be for the very acts which the officer admits to have been done by him under federal authority,[10] and it is enough that his acts or his presence at the place in performance of his official duty constitute the basis, although mistaken or false, of such proceeding;[11] accordingly, it is not necessary, in order that he may remove, that the officer should admit that he performed the act for which he is prosecuted,[12] and a like rule applies to the removal of a civil suit against an officer who denies the performance of the act charged.[13] While an act of a federal officer, not expressly authorized by a federal statute, may be such an inevitable outgrowth of such officer's discharge of his federal duty and so closely interrelated with it as to bring such act within the Removal Act,[14] certain acts not a part of his official duty, although having some relation to such duty, may be too remote to come within the purview of the removal statute in question.[15] The statute makes a mere claim by a federal officer within its purview that the acts complained of were done in the discharge of his duties as a federal officer a basis of federal jurisdiction, at least until such claim shall prove unfounded.[16] In general the acts which are within the purview of the statute if performed by a federal officer are also within it if performed by a person acting under such officer's authority and direction.[17]

[§ 95] 5. Proceedings Removable—a. Civil Suits.[29] The statute in specific terms includes,[30] and has frequently been applied in permitting the removal of, civil suits.[31]

Particular suits. Subject to applicable rules and qualifications in respect of what are revenue laws, and what acts are within the removal statute in question,[32] and as to what officers or persons are within, or entitled to the benefit of, such statute,[33] and in accordance with the general rule herein stated, it has been held or recognized that, among others, the following suits or actions are within the purview of such removal statute: An action against a collector of internal revenue to recover back moneys alleged to have been illegally exacted as internal revenue duties;[34] an action against a collector of customs by a carrier to recover freight charges which, it was alleged, the collector had received in the performance of his official duties;[35] an action by an informer to recover from a collector of customs part of the proceeds of forfeited goods;[36] an action against a postmaster for refusal to deliver a letter;[37] an action against a prohibition agent;[38] an action for slander against a collector of customs,[39] and against a surveyor of a port,[40] based on statements in connection with official duties; a summary proceeding by a landlord to recover from a lessee possession of premises used as a bonded warehouse, to which proceeding a collector of internal revenue and a United States storekeeper are made parties defendant;[41] a proceeding under a writ of foreign attachment issued in a suit between private individuals, upon the property of defendant which was in the possession of a collector of customs;[42] a proceeding to punish a collector of internal revenue for contempt in refusing to permit the sheriff to enter a warehouse;[43] an action for acts done by defendant under authority of post office inspectors;[44] an action for assault against a state enforcement officer who, at the time of the alleged assault, was assisting a federal prohibition officer;[45] and a suit to enjoin a contractor from proceeding with the construction of a post office under contract with the secretary of the treasury.[46] Among other suits which, it has been held or recognized, are not removable under the removal statute in question are: An action against an assistant treasurer of the United States to recover the value of United States bonds, the possession of which plaintiff had permitted defendant to take, and which defendant had retained on the ground that they were the property of a state;[47] a suit to enjoin a naval officer from interfering with certain land which, defendant claimed, was purchased for military purposes under a naval appropriation act;[48] an action to recover back from a United States commissioner moneys received by him as costs and fees in a case arising under a revenue law in which he acted as a magistrate;[49] an action against a United States district attorney for trespass, alleged to have been committed while he was searching for opium imported for other than medicinal purposes in violation of law;[50] and an action against a common carrier for refusal to accept goods for transportation because of nonpayment of a stamp tax by the shipper.[51]

[§ 96] b. Criminal Prosecutions—(1) In General. The statute in specific terms includes,[52] and, subject to general rules as to what are revenue laws, and what acts are, within the statute,[53] and as to what officers or persons are within, or entitled to the benefit of, such statute,[54] has frequently been applied in permitting[55] the removal of criminal prosecutions, including a prosecution for a misdemeanor which may be prosecuted without indictment.[56] The prosecutions which are removable under the statute in question are those instituted for alleged violations of state laws,[57] in which defenses are set up or claimed under United States laws or authority.[58]

[§ 97] (2) Particular Prosecutions. In accordance with general rules and subject to applicable qualifications and limitations,[59] among other prosecutions, which, it has been held or recognized, are removable, are: A prosecution against a revenue officer for assault,[60] against a deputy internal revenue officer for murder,[61] against a revenue officer for conspiracy to extort money;[62] a prosecution against a deputy United States marshal for murder;[63] a prosecution against a prohibition agent[64] for assault,[65] and for murder or manslaughter;[66] and a prosecution against a member of a posse comitatus of a deputy United States marshal for assault,[67] and for murder.[68] Among other prosecutions which, it has been held or recognized, are not removable under the removal statute in question are: A prosecution against a prohibition agent for reckless driving while not engaged in the performance of his duty,[69] for obstructing justice by giving false testimony before a coroner,[70] and for perjury alleged to have been committed in a proceeding before a coroner;[71] and a prosecution for selling liquor in violation of a state law against a person holding a license from the United States,[72] against a person who sold liquor on which the internal revenue tax had been paid,[73] and against a person who sold liquor, the formula for which was approved by the federal prohibition commissioner.[74]

[§ 98] 6. Persons or Parties within or Entitled to Benefit of Statute—a. In General. The terms of the statute confine the right to remove to removal by defendant.[75] attempts to enforce, a revenue law; and the secretary of the treasury in administering a law for the construction of a post office,[86] a post-office inspector,[87] and a postmaster.[88] By virtue of a provision in the National Prohibition Act[89] prohibition officers and agents, in respect of their enforcement of such act, are entitled to the benefit of the statute here under consideration;[90] and apart from such provision of the Prohibition Act, such officers and agents are, it seems, entitled to the benefit of the removal statute in respect of acts performed while they are engaged in the enforcement of a revenue law.[91] On the other hand, it has been held or recognized that the secretary of the interior,[92] an engineer appointed and acting under the reclamation act,[93] a United States commissioner while acting as an examining and committing magistrate in a case arising out of a revenue law,[94] and a United States district attorney when not acting under a revenue law,[95] are not within the purview of the statute.

[§ 100] c. Persons Other than Federal Officers. In general, where the case is otherwise within the purview of the removal statute in question, all who lawfully assist a federal officer in the performance of his duties are entitled to remove the proceeding under such statute,[96] but, in respect of persons other than federal officers, it has been held that the statute applies only to persons who so assist federal officers or act under or by the authority of such officers,[97] and does not include other persons who merely claim rights or authority under revenue laws.[98]

Particular persons. Subject to applicable rules as to what are revenue laws, and as to what acts are, within the purview of the removal statute in question,[99] and to the general rules and qualifications herein stated as to what persons are within the statute, it has been held or recognized that, among others, the following persons, not federal officers, are entitled to remove under such statute: A member of a posse comitatus of a deputy internal revenue collector,[1] and of a United States marshal acting under a revenue law,[2] a local police officer assigned to assist post office inspectors,[3] and a corporation constructing a post office under the authority of the secretary of the treasury.[4] By virtue of a provision of the National Prohibition Act[5] persons acting under the authority and direction of prohibition officers or agents, in the enforcement of such act, are, it seems, entitled to the benefit of the statute here under consideration,[6] and it seems that, apart from such provision of the National Prohibition Act, such persons are entitled to the benefit of the removal statute in respect of acts done while the prohibition officers are engaged in the enforcement of a revenue law.[7] Among others to whom the right to remove under the removal statute in question has been denied are: A person, prosecuted under a state liquor law,[8] who holds a license from the United States to keep and sell liquor,[9] or who sells a preparation the formula for which has been approved by the federal prohibition commissioner,[10] and a carrier which claimed to be acting under a revenue law in refusing to accept a shipment for transportation.[11]

[§ 101] 7. Pleading or Indictment as Affecting Removability. In a civil suit, the fact that the act complained of is one within the removal statute in question[12] may appear either from plaintiff's pleading[13] or in the petition for removal.[14] In the case of a criminal prosecution, the right to remove may not be defeated by the brevity, permissible under state practice, of a charge in an indictment which renders difficult a determination as to whether the accused officer was acting under color of his office in performing the act on which the indictment is based.[15]

[a] Word "protection," as used in National Prohibition Act § 28 (USCA tit 27 § 45) (1) was inserted for the purpose of giving to officers and persons acting under the authority of the National Prohibition Act in enforcement of its provisions, the same protection of a trial in a federal court of state prosecutions as is accorded to revenue officers under Judicial Code § 33 (USCA tit 28 § 76). Maryland v. Soper, 270 U. S. 9, 46 SCt 185, 70 L. ed. 449. (2) "The natural meaning of the word would be protection against resistance or attack when carrying out their duties; and there are provisions in the revenue laws to which it might apply. The danger, however, which such an officer would incur in the performance of his duties, if subject to prosecution or suit in local courts, in perhaps an unfriendly atmosphere and surroundings, might be very considerable. . . . I think that the right of removal is a 'protection' to the prohibition agents in the enforcement of the act, within the meaning of section 28 [USCA tit 27 § 45]." Massachusetts v. [§ 102] B. Officers of Federal Courts—1. In General. By statute,[16] any civil suit or criminal prosecution[17] commenced in any court of a state against any officer of the courts of the United States[18] for or on account of any act[19] done under color of his office or in the performance of his duties as such officer, may at any time before the trial or final hearing thereof[20] be removed for trial[21] into the district court next to be holden in the district where the same is pending[22] upon the petition[23] of such defendant[24] in the manner specified.[25]

[§ 103] 2. Validity of Statute. The constitutionality of the statute has been upheld[26] in cases in which it was applied to receivers of federal courts.[27]

[§ 104] 3. Acts Included.[28] In cases involving receivers appointed by federal courts the statute here considered has been given a broad construction so as to include practically any act performed by him in connection with his trust,[29] as, for example, acts performed by him in the operation of property entrusted to him under his appointment.[30] So, too, acts in connection with service of process by a deputy United States marshal have been regarded as acts within the statute.[31] On the other hand, in determining the removability of a suit against a trustee in bankruptcy the rule has been laid down that the statute includes only acts of a court officer,[32] as distinguished from mere claims of title or other legal rights.[33]

[§ 105] 4. Proceedings Removable—a. Civil Suits. The specific terms of the statute include,[34] and have been applied in permitting,[35] the removal of civil suits. While it has been laid down that the mere fact that defendant is an officer of a federal court does not render a suit against him removable under the removal statute here considered,[36] actions otherwise removable under this statute are removable regardless of the amount in controversy[37] and the citizenship, allegiance, or residence of the parties;[38] and the tendency is to give the statute a broad construction in respect of what suits are removable.[39] Thus it has been held or recognized that the statute authorizes the removal of any suit against a receiver[40] appointed by a federal court, for acts directly connected with the receiver's trust,[41] including acts in the operation or management of property in the receiver's care under his appointment.[42] On the other hand, in determining the removability of a suit against a trustee in bankruptcy, it has been held that the statute does not apply to a suit to establish a lien in which such trustee merely sets up a claim of title acquired by operation of law, and not by any of the trustee's own acts, from the bankrupt.[43]

Liability Act,[44] it has been held or recognized that an action under such act against a receiver is removable under the said removal statute,[45] regardless of the amount in controversy[46] and the citizenship of the parties[47] on the theory that the said removal statute and the said statutory provision forbidding removal are inconsistent and that the removal statute, being the later statute and clearly including the removal in question, must be given effect.[48]

[§ 106] b. Criminal Prosecutions. The statute in specific terms provides for the removal of criminal prosecutions[49] and applies to a criminal prosecution against a deputy United States marshal.[50]

[§ 107] 5. Who May Remove—a. In General. The terms of the statute here considered which specifically provide for removal by defendant, does not permit, it seems, removal by plaintiff.[51]

[§ 108] b. What Officers Included. It has been held or recognized that the statute gives the right to remove to a receiver appointed by a federal court,[52] to a United States commissioner,[53] to a United States marshal,[54] and to a deputy United States marshal.[55] On the other hand, the statute does not include the secretary of the interior.[56]

[§ 109] C. Officers of Either House of Congress.[57] By statute,[58] any civil suit or criminal prosecution against any person for or on account of any act done by him while an officer of either house of congress in the discharge of his official duties in executing any order of such house may at any time before trial or final hearing thereof[59] be removed for trial[60] into the district court next to be holden in the district where the same is pending[61] upon the petition[62] of such defendant in the manner specified.[63] The secretary of the interior, when acting under a reclamation statute, is not an officer of either house of congress within the meaning of the statute.[64]

[§ 110] D. Persons in Military Service of United States. The statute providing for the removal of suits or prosecutions against any officer, soldier, or other person in the military service of the United States under certain circumstances[65] has no application where defendant at the time when the occurrence complained of occurred was not engaged in an enterprise in any way connected with or incident to his duties as a soldier.[66]

VI. DENIAL OF, OR INABILITY TO ENFORCE, CIVIL RIGHTS[67]

[By William G. Bannon]

[§ 111] A. In General. By statute,[68] any civil suit or criminal prosecution[69] commenced in any state court, for any cause whatever, against any person[70] who is denied or cannot enforce[71] in the judicial tribunals of the state or in the part of the state where such suit or prosecution is pending, any right[72] secured to him by any law[73] providing for the equal civil rights of citizens of the United States, or of all persons within the jurisdiction of the United States,[74] or against any officer, civil or military, or other person, for any arrest or imprisonment or other trespasses or wrongs made or committed by virtue of or under color of authority derived from any law providing for equal rights as aforesaid, or for refusing to do any act on the ground that it would be inconsistent with such law, may, upon the petition of such defendant,[75] filed in said state court[76] at any time before trial or final hearing[77] of the cause, stating the facts and verified by oath,[78] be removed for trial[79] into the next district court to be held in the district where it is pending.[80] In view of the general rule that the denial of, or inability to enforce, an equal civil right referred to in the statute is a denial or inability to enforce effected by a provision of a state constitution or law,[81] it would seem that the right to remove under such statute exists in comparatively few cases.[82]

[§ 112] B. Validity of Statute. The constitutionality of the removal statute here considered has been upheld,[83] authority for its enactment being found in the Fourteenth Amendment to the federal constitution.[84]

[§ 113] C. Equal Civil Rights Protected, and Denial or Inability To Protect Such Rights—1. In General. The removal statute in question includes equal civil rights secured by the federal statute[85] securing equal rights in respect of person, property, contracts, litigation, prosecution, and punishment,[86] and, it seems, certain rights secured by the Fourteenth Amendment to the federal constitution,[87] although it has been held or recognized that the Fourteenth Amendment is broader than the removal statute and that the statute does not necessarily authorize the removal of a cause because of a denial of a right under such amendment.[88] A state statute which denies to defendant an equal civil right which is within the purview of the removal statute may be made the basis of removal,[89] but such removal statute is in general limited to a denial of, or an inability to enforce, equal civil rights, resulting from the constitution or laws of a state,[90] and does not include the possibility of an administration of a state law which would be discriminatory,[91] an actually wrongful administration of a state law,[92] or, in general, any discrimination due to illegal, corrupt, or other improper acts of administrative or other officers, not authorized by the constitution or laws of the state as interpreted by its highest court.[93] So, where the denial claimed does not result from the constitution or laws of the state, the statute does not apply to a denial or possibility or apprehension of a denial by judicial action during the trial,[94] in the sentence,[95] or in the execution of the sentence.[96] Where a statute which would constitute a denial of equal rights within the meaning of the removal statute has been declared unconstitutional by the highest court of the state, a right to remove cannot thereafter be based on such invalid statute.[97] In Porto Rico there is authority for the view that even though a local law violates a right, it may not be made a basis of removal under the removal statute here considered if it is applicable to all alike and is in no sense discriminatory.[98]

[§ 114] 2. Particular State or Local Statutes. In view of the fact that negroes are entitled to freedom from the discrimination effected by rejecting negroes as jurors,[99] it has been held or recognized that such exclusion of negroes from a grand or petit jury under authority of a state statute is such a denial of an equal civil right as will permit removal of a prosecution by a negro defendant.[1] Among other state statutes which, it has been held or recognized, did not deny an equal civil right or were not discriminatory, and, therefore, did not furnish a ground for removal under the removal statute in question are: certain statutes governing the qualifications and selection of jurors,[2] a statute prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors,[3] statutes aimed at gambling, betting, or lotteries,[4] and a statute which permits the state to sue in its own name without giving bond or other security or causing affidavit to be made, which is applicable to all suits by the state.[5] So it has been held that there was no ground for the removal of a prosecution of an alien, sought on the theory that under the state statute he could not obtain a jury de medietate linguæ,[6] where, although one statutory provision made citizenship a qualification of jurors, another provided for juries de medietate linguæ, and there had been neither a demand by accused for a jury de medietate linguæ nor refusal by the state courts to direct such a jury.[7] So it has been held that an immunity statute applicable to testimony before a legislative committee was not a denial of a civil right within the meaning of the removal statute in question.[8] The fact that a state statute permits a judge challenged because of alleged disqualification to pass on the challenge does not furnish a ground for removal where in the particular case the judge is not within the provisions of the statute defining the grounds of disqualification.[9] In Porto Rico it has been held that a statute which makes provision for a change of venue on the application of the prosecuting officer for cause shown may not be the basis of a removal from an insular court to the federal district court under the removal act here considered, where the venue statute applies to all alike and is in no sense discriminatory.[10]

[§ 115] 3. Particular Acts. The federal statute securing civil rights[11] and the Fourteenth Amendment to the federal constitution secure to a negro the right to immunity from discrimination against him by the rejection of negroes as jurors because of their color, and such rejection may be made the basis of removal.[12] In accordance with the general rule, however, that the denial of or inability to enforce a right, on which a right to remove is based, must be found in the state constitution or other law,[13] it has been held or recognized that a right to remove cannot successfully be claimed, where the denial or inability to enforce is not based on the state constitution or law, because of alleged irregularities in respect of the selection of a jury;[14] the wrongful exclusion from the grand jury or petit jury of a certain class of persons;[15] the conduct of a judge[16] or the foreman of the grand jury[17] with respect to proceedings of the grand jury; the alleged bias of a judge;[18] the conduct of a prosecuting officer;[19] postponements of the trial against the protest of defendant;[20] inability of defendant to obtain an attorney;[21] alleged prevention of attendance of a witness because of threatened service of process on such witness;[22] the refusal of the state courts to recognize a pardon given to defendant;[23] and decisions of the highest court of the state which give a different effect, as between the right of sale under a mortgage and the right of sale under a deed of trust, to a state statute of limitations which has effected a bar of the debt.[24] So, too, it has been held that the right to remove may not be based on the mere fact that there is no appeal to the highest court in the state from the refusal of a motion to quash an indictment[25] or the jury panel.[26] The fact that the grand jury which returned the indictment against accused was organized under a statute not applicable to the case because enacted after the offense charged was committed, is not a ground for removal if such statute does not deny a right within the rules as to what constitutes a denial.[27] The existence of a general prejudice against accused is not ground for removal under the statute in question,[28] as, for example, prejudice because of defendant's color, which might prevent a fair trial.[29] The mere fact that the suit is by a state in one of its own courts against a citizen of another state is not such a denial of the equal protection of the laws, within the meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment of the constitution of the United States, as to furnish ground for removal.[30]

[a] State constitutional provision rendered inoperative by Fifteenth Amendment to federal constitution.—It has been held that the civil right of a negro in respect of freedom from discrimination by exclusion of negroes from juries, was not denied, within the meaning of the removal statute, by a state statute making the right to vote a qualification for jury service, when construed with a provision of the state constitution restricting the right to vote to certain white citizens, where such constitutional provision was adopted long before the adoption of the Fifteenth Amendment to the federal constitution which forbids the denial of the right to vote on account of color, since the adoption of the Fifteenth Amendment removed from the state constitution, or rendered inoperative, such restrictive provision. VII. SUITS INVOLVING LAND CLAIMED UNDER GRANTS FROM DIFFERENT STATES

[By Eustace W. Tomlinson]

[§ 118] A. In General. Under the statute providing for the removal from a state court to a federal court of suits in which plaintiffs and defendants claim land under grants from different states,[40] such a suit is removable although both grants were founded upon warrants issued by one of the states which at the time comprehended the entire territory afterward divided between the two upon the creation of the second state;[41] but a suit is not removable where the second grant was made by the one state under power delegated by the other, from which its territory had been separated upon its creation.[42]

[§ 119] B. Who May Remove. By the express provisions of the statute relating to the removal, from a court of a state to a federal court, of suits in which the parties claim land under grants from different states, a right of removal may be exercised by either plaintiff or defendant.[43]

VIII. DIVERSITY OF CITIZENSHIP OR ALLEGIANCE AND CHARACTER OF PARTIES[44]

[By William G. Bannon]

[§ 120] A. In General. The earliest statute giving a right to remove based on the citizenship or alienage of parties or a party to the suit was the provision of the Judiciary Act of 1789.[45] Later general provisions for removal on such ground are found in the Revised Statutes of the United States,[46] in the Removal Act of 1875,[47] and in the Removal Act of 1887–1888;[48] and the provisions in the present Removal Act are, in this regard, substantially the same as the provisions of the act of 1887–1888.[49] The constitutionality of statutory provisions for removal on the ground in question has been recognized, or upheld,[50] but the tendency is against a construction which will enlarge the right to remove,[51] although this rule does permit the denial of the right to remove as against statutory provisions which are definite and free from ambiguity.[52] As affecting the question of removability on this ground, there must be considered the statutory provisions for removal on the ground of prejudice or local influence,[53] and on the ground of the existence of a separable controversy between parties.[54] The right to remove is limited by the rules requiring that, in order that a suit may be removed, it must be one of which the federal court would have original jurisdiction,[55] and by restrictions as to the nature or type of suits which are removable.[56]

Necessity for controversy. The right to remove does not depend upon whether defendant is actually controverting or disputing the relief sought provided plaintiff's pleading shows a case justifying relief.[57]

Whole case removed. Where one of several defendants removes a suit to enforce a joint liability, without joinder of the other defendant or defendants who would be entitled to remove but who have not been served with process,[58] the whole case is thereby removed,[59] and defendant or defendants not served may, upon being duly served or upon entering an appearance, either have the suit remanded, or permit it to proceed in the federal court.[60] In the case of the removal of a suit, brought in the name of a state on the relation of a public officer, because defendant has raised, in good faith, the question of the constitutionality of the statute which plaintiff seeks to enforce,[61] the federal court has jurisdiction of all questions involved.[62]

[§ 121] B. Suits Between Citizens of Different States in General.[63] Subject to rules hereinbefore and hereinafter stated,[64] in general diversity of state citizenship between plaintiff and defendant is ground for removal,[65] the provision of the Removal Act[66] that any other suit of a civil nature, at law or in equity, of which the district courts of the United States are given jurisdiction may be removed into the district court of the United States for the proper district,[67] by defendant or defendants therein,[68] being nonresidents of that state,[69] when read in connection with the statutory provision conferring original jurisdiction on the federal district courts,[70] being the basis for removal generally on this ground.[71] Removal for diversity of citizenship involves removal in certain cases, because of prejudice or local influence,[72] and because of the existence of a separable controversy.[73] Where, however, both plaintiff and defendant are citizens of the same state, the suit is not, of course, removable on the ground here under consideration.[74]

[§ 122] C. Suits to Which Alien Party in General.[78]

Where an alien brings an action in a state court, it is not removable by defendant unless authority for such removal is found in some federal statute.[79] The right to remove, within certain limitations, suits to which aliens are parties has, however, been conferred by congress,[80] and subject to rules hereinbefore and hereinafter stated,[81] in general a suit by an alien against a citizen of a state,[82] or against an alien by a citizen of a state,[83] is removable, the provision of the Removal Act[84] that any suit of a civil nature, at law or in equity, of which the district courts of the United States are given jurisdiction, may be removed into the district court of the United States for the proper district[85] by defendant or defendants therein,[86] being nonresidents of that state,[87] when read in connection with the statutory provision conferring original jurisdiction on the federal district courts,[88] being the basis for removal generally on the ground that an alien and a citizen are adverse parties to the suit.[89] The courts of the United States cannot, however, obtain jurisdiction by removal because of the citizenship or allegiance of the parties where the controversy is between two aliens,[90] or where the suit is by a state against an alien.[91]

[b] Prior to the act of 1875 (1) where an action was brought in a state other than that of which either party was a citizen, there could be no removal. Sewing Mach. Cos.' Case, 18 Wall. (U. (2) Under the Judiciary Act of 1789, providing for removal where a suit was commenced by a citizen of the state in which the suit was brought, against a citizen of another state, there could be no removal, where plaintiff was a citizen of a state other than that in which suit was brought, although other plaintiffs were citizens of that state. [a] The purpose of the removal acts (1) in giving the federal courts jurisdiction of controversies between citizens of one state and aliens is, it has been said, to secure a tribunal presumed to be more impartial than the state court. Hall v. Great Northern R. Co., 197 Fed. 488. (2) But it seems that a suit is removable from a court of a state of which the citizen party is not a citizen or resident. [a] The contrary view (1) has been taken, however, where defendant was a nonresident of the state where the action was brought and plaintiff did not consent to removal, on the theory that where a citizen of a state is sued by an alien, suit must be brought in the district of which defendant is an inhabitant. Jackson v. William Kenefick Co., 233 Fed. 130; Ivanoff v. Mechanical Rubber Co., 232 Fed. 173; Hall v. Great Northern R. Co., 197 Fed. 488; Sagara v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 189 Fed. 220; Odhner v. [b] Under the Removal Act of 1866–1867, an action by an alien against a defendant who was a citizen of a state other than that in which the action was brought was not removable. Knickerbocker L. Ins. Co v. Gorbach, 70 Pa. 150.

[a] Suit by corporation of a state other than that in which action brought.—The fact that plaintiff corporation is organized under the laws of a state other than the one in which suit is brought does not prevent the removal of a suit against an alien. Attleboro v. Frankfort Mar., etc., Ins. Co., 202 Fed. 293; Wind River Lumber Co. v. Frankfort Mar., etc., Ins. Co., 196 Fed. 340, 116 CCA 160.

[b] The fact that plaintiffs are citizens of different states does not prevent removal by an alien defendant notwithstanding the wording of the statute which gives jurisdiction to the federal courts of suits between citizens of "a state" and foreign citizens or subjects. A member of an Indian tribe who is not a citizen of the United States is not a citizen or subject of a foreign state within the meaning of the statutory provisions for removal.[92]

[§ 123] D. Removability of Suits to Which United States Party in General. The United States is not a citizen of any state within the meaning of statutory provisions authorizing removal on the ground of diversity of state citizenship,[93] and where it is a real and necessary party to the suit, the suit is not removable on such ground.[94] Removal sought solely because the United States was a party, has been denied on the ground that in the particular case the United States was merely a formal party.[95] By special statute, the United States may intervene in a suit to which a restricted member of the Five Civilized Tribes in Oklahoma is a party and remove such suit to the federal district court.[96]

[§ 124] E. Removability of Suits to Federal Court in Porto Rico in General. Under the provisions of the Organic Act of Porto Rico, defining the jurisdiction of the federal district court there, and making applicable, as between such court and the local courts, the laws of the United States as to removal of causes,[97] it is not necessary that plaintiff should be a citizen of Porto Rico or of any sovereign power where defendants are citizens or subjects of a foreign state or states, or citizens of a state, territory or district of the United States, and not domiciled in Porto Rico,[98] as, for example, where Porto Rico is itself the plaintiff.[99] Where all parties to the proceeding are domiciled in Porto Rico, there can be no removal.[1]

[§ 125] F. Who Are or May Be Considered Citizens—1. In General. The citizens referred to in statutes under which removal of suits from state to federal courts is authorized are citizens of states of the United States,[2] and a removal cannot be based on the citizenship of a citizen of the United States, who is not a citizen of any state.[3]

Inanimate object. A vessel is not a citizen within the meaning of the Removal Act.[4]

[§ 126] 2. United States and Officers Representing United States. The United States is not, of course, a citizen of any state within the meaning of the provisions of the Removal Act here under consideration.[5] So, too, the view has been taken that an officer of the United States is not to be regarded as a citizen of a state when he is sued in his official capacity as representing the United States.[6]

[§ 127] 3. State.[7] A state is not a citizen within the meaning of the provisions of the Removal Act here under consideration,[8] and jurisdiction cannot be taken by removal of a controversy between a state and a citizen of another state,[9] or between a state and an alien,[10] on the grounds here under consideration.

[§ 128] 4. Political Subdivision of State.[11] Within the meaning of the Removal Act, various political subdivisions of the state have been considered citizens[12] of the state under the laws of which they are organized,[13] so as to permit the removal to the federal courts of suits to which they are parties where all other requisites for removal are present. This rule applies to municipal corporations,[14] such as incorporated cities;[15] and other public corporations and quasi corporations,[16] such as counties,[17] county poor districts,[18] and school districts.[19] There is, however, apparently authority for the view that under the statutes of some states neither a board of supervisors[20] nor a drainage district[21] may be regarded as a citizen within the meaning of the Removal Act.

[§ 130] 6. Unincorporated Association.[25] An unincorporated joint stock association or company is not as such a citizen[26] of the state under whose laws it was organized[27] within the meaning of the Removal Act.

[§ 131] 7. Partnership.[28] A partnership as such is not a citizen[29] of any state[30] within the meaning of the Removal Act.

[§ 132] 8. Resident or Citizen of District of Columbia and Territories. The federal courts cannot acquire jurisdiction by removal because of diversity of citizenship of a suit to which a citizen of the United States domiciled in the District of Columbia,[31] or a citizen of a territory,[32] is a party. So a corporation organized under the laws of the District of Columbia is not a citizen of any state in the sense that its presence as a party will give rise to diversity of citizenship.[33]

ports permanent residence in a state with an intention to remain.[39] Residence alone is not the equivalent of citizenship,[40] as a person may be a citizen of a state and reside temporarily elsewhere.[41]

Married woman and widow. It has been held that a husband and wife who are not living apart under a legal separation cannot be citizens of different states,[42] and in general the domicile and citizenship of a widow remain that of her deceased husband until she changes them.[43]

Infant. In general, in the absence of emancipation or the surrender of parental control, the domicile of an infant party is that of his father,[44] and upon the death of the father, the domicile becomes that of the mother.[45]

State citizenship. The citizens referred to in statutes under which removal is authorized are citizens of states of the United States.[46]

Estoppel to deny citizenship. Statements in a document signed by a person, that such person is "of" or is "residing in" a certain state do not prevent such person subsequently from denying citizenship in such state as bearing on the matter of removal, at least where such statements did not induce conduct on the part of others which would operate to the prejudice of such others if such denial were permitted.[47]

Evidence. While residence in a certain state is prima facie evidence of citizenship,[48] it is not conclusive.[49] A party's own evidence as to his citizenship[50] and evidence as to his declarations in this regard[51] may be considered, and where supported by collateral facts and circumstances may be sufficient to show citizenship in accordance with such evidence and declarations,[52] but, in the face of conflicting acts and declarations, statements of a party tending to show citizenship in a certain state are not conclusive.[53]

[§ 136] b. Change of Citizenship or Allegiance.[54] In general, a domicile fixing citizenship[55] once existing, continues until another is acquired,[56] but, as affecting jurisdiction by removal, there may be a change of citizenship from one state to another by a change of residence with the intention that such residence shall be permanent.[57] In order to effect a change of citizenship from one state to another state,[58] or from a state to a territory,[59] the change must be made with the intention permanently to remain in such other state or in such territory, and the change must be a voluntary act of the party;[60] but it is not necessary that the person making the change should reside for any particular period in the state to which the change is made;[61] nor is it necessary that there should be a fixed residence in such state.[62]

Married woman. Where a husband changes his domicile, it has been held that that of his wife is also changed where they are not living apart under a legal separation.[63]

Infant. The domicile of an infant ordinarily changes with that of the parents,[64] and while the widowed mother of an infant remains unmarried, by changing her domicile, she thereby changes that of the infant.[65] Conversely, in general the domicile of an infant is not changed notwithstanding a sojourn in a state other than that of which the father remains a citizen.[66]

Alien. The filing of a declaration of his intention to become a citizen of the United States does not terminate a party's alienage, or render him a citizen of a particular state,[67] even though he is permitted, by the laws of the state where he resides, to vote and to hold office;[68] and it has been held that by marriage to an alien a citizen who continued to reside in the United States did not lose her citizenship within the meaning of the Removal Act.[69]

Taking oath of allegiance to foreign sovereign. It has been held that the fact that a citizen took an oath of allegiance to the sovereign of a foreign country and accepted from such sovereign an appointment as consul, did not render such citizen an alien within the meaning of the removal statute.[70]

Change to acquire domicile for purpose of suit.[71] Unless the change is only ostensible and without the intention to reside permanently in the new abode,[72] the fact that defendant has moved from one state to another merely to enable him to invoke federal jurisdiction, does not defeat his right to remove;[73] and a like rule has been applied when one of the purposes of plaintiff in going to another state was to prevent the removal of a suit which he might bring in a state court.[74]

Evidence. In general, domicile once shown to exist is presumed to continue,[75] and the burden is on the person asserting the change to prove it.[76] The intention as to a change of domicile and citizenship by a particular person is to be gathered largely from the acts of such person,[77] and while his own evidence,[78] and evidence as to his declarations,[79] in this regard, may be considered, such evidence is not conclusive,[80] but a party's evidence as to his intention in this regard may be sufficient to determine the question where such evidence is in accord with collateral facts and circumstances.[81] While residence outside the state in which a party was a resident may be evidence of a change of citizenship,[82] such evidence is not conclusive.[83]

[§ 137] 2. Political Subdivision of State. A political subdivision of a state, which as already pointed out is usually, at least, treated as a citizen within the statutes permitting removal,[84] is regarded as a citizen of the state in which it is located and under whose laws it is organized.[85]

[§ 138] 3. Corporation[86]—a. In General. In determining the question as to the removability of a suit to which a corporation is a party, where removal depends on the place of citizenship of such corporation, the general rule is that it is a citizen[87] of the state by, or under the laws of, which it was incorporated, chartered, or created,[88] on the theory that the corporation is presumed to be composed of citizens of such state,[89] or, as sometimes expressed, that the incorporators and stockholders are presumed to be citizens of such state,[90] which presumptions are conclusive.[91] The foregoing rule applies notwithstanding the fact that the corporation of one state may have an office in another state;[92] that it may engage in business or exercise its functions in another state,[93] under a license or permit;[94] that it may own property in another state;[95] that it may have appointed an agent or attorney in another state on whom service of process may be made;[96] or that the individual members or stockholders may not be citizens of the state of incorporation.[97]

[§ 139] b. Reincorporation or Domestication and Consolidation and Merger. In determining the question as to removability, a corporation may be regarded solely as a citizen of the state by which it was originally created, although it is afterward constituted what is termed, or is in form, a domestic corporation of another state,[98] as where a corporation is compelled, in order to do business or to exercise its functions in a state other than that of original incorporation, to become a corporation of such other state,[99] or, in general, acts under, or takes advantage of, so-called domestication acts,[1] and where the corporation is sued in such other state, it may, if otherwise entitled to remove, assert a right to remove as a citizen of the state of original incorporation.[2] So too a corporation ordinarily does not lose citizenship in the state where it originally was incorporated by incorporation in another state.[3] There are cases, however, in which it has been held or recognized that a corporation may be created a corporation of a state and so become in effect a citizen of that state insofar as the question as to removability is concerned, although it has the same organization as a corporation created in another state;[4] and where suit is brought against the corporation in the state in which the later incorporation occurred by a citizen of that state, the corporation cannot remove on the ground of diversity of citizenship.[5]

Consolidation or merger. Where corporations of different states are consolidated into a new corporation which is organized under the laws of each of such states, the consolidated corporation is to be treated as a corporation of each of the states[6] and when sued in one of the states in which it is chartered by a citizen of the state in which suit is brought, the corporation cannot remove.[7] A distinction has been made in connection with the matter here under discussion, between consolidation and merger,[8] and the view has been taken that where by merger a corporation of one state absorbs a corporation of another state, the former alone remains in existence, and, for the purpose of the removability of suits to which it is a party, is regarded as a citizen only of the state in which it was incorporated.[9]

[§ 140] c. National Banking Association. The statute providing that for the purposes of actions other than those mentioned in the statute, by or against national banking associations, such associations shall be deemed citizens of the state in which they are respectively located,[10] applies where the question as to removability of a suit against such an association turns on citizenship.[11]

[§ 141] d. Alien Corporation. In determining the question as to removal, the individual members of a corporation created by the laws of a foreign country are conclusively presumed to be citizens or subjects of such foreign country,[12] and such corporation is, therefore, regarded as an alien.[13]

[§ 142] 4. Unincorporated Association. An unincorporated joint-stock association is not as such regarded as a citizen[14] of the state under the laws of which such association is organized,[15] and the citizenship of the members of the association governs,[16] even where the state statute authorizes suit against an officer of the association, without joining the individual members.[17]

[§ 143] 5. Partnership. A partnership as such is not a citizen[18] of any state within the meaning of statutory provisions under which the right to remove depends on citizenship,[19] and this rule has been applied to a limited partnership association organized under the laws of a state,[20] and the actual citizenship of the several partners is the determining factor.[21] Where a partnership is sued in the partnership name without joining the partners as individuals, as authorized by a state statute, it has been held that there could not be a removal on the ground of diversity of citizenship on the theory that citizenship could not be predicated of a partnership as such,[22] but a different conclusion has been reached where, under the statute, plaintiff sues in the partnership name.[23] Under the provisions of the Porto Rican Organic Law making applicable, as between the local courts of Porto Rico and the federal district court of Porto Rico, the laws of the United States as to removal, the question as to removal is to be determined by the citizenship of the members of the partnership whether or not under the law of the place of origin of the partnership it is regarded as an entity and may sue and be sued in the partnership name.[24]

[§ 144] H. What Constitutes Diversity and What Parties or Persons Considered—1. In General. The question as to the right to remove on the ground here under discussion is not determinable solely from the designation of the parties, or from their alignment as plaintiffs or defendant set forth in plaintiff's pleading and in this connection it frequently becomes necessary for the court to determine whether or not the parties so designated are merely formal or nominal parties whose presence may be disregarded,[25] whether or not there has been an improper or fraudulent joinder of parties,[26] and whether or not the alignment set forth in plaintiff's pleading is in accordance with the actual relation of the parties to the controversy.[27] While ordinarily only a party to the record is to be considered,[28] there are cases in which the court looks beyond the pleadings in this regard.[29] In general, it seems that the question of a plaintiff's rightful status as a party in an action at law is to be determined by the law of the state.[30]

[§ 145] 2. Necessity for Diversity as to All Adverse Parties.[31] A controversy or suit between citizens of different states which may be removed from a state to a federal court is one in which every party upon one side is a citizen of a different state from that of every party upon the other;[32] and subject to the rules governing the removal of separable controversies,[33] and the rules permitting the court, under certain circumstances, to disregard persons who have been formally made parties,[34] plaintiffs and defendants, when arranged according to their true interests,[35] must all be considered;[36] and the suit may not be removed where citizens of the same state are ranged on opposite sides, although citizens of other states are also parties;[37] and in cases arising under the Removal Act, since it has required that the defendant seeking removal shall be a nonresident of the state in which the suit is brought, the right to remove has been denied[38] where plaintiff and a defendant or defendants are citizens and residents of the state in which the suit is brought and another defendant or defendants are citizens and residents of another state or states.[39]

Where an alien is a party, all the parties on each side must be considered, and the requisite jurisdictional citizenship must exist as to each,[40] and where there are several defendants or plaintiffs and there is an alien on each side,[41] or there is a citizen of the same state as that of the opposite party on the same side of the controversy as an alien,[42] there can be no removal.

[§ 146] 3. Diversity between Parties on Same Side of Controversy. Parties on the same side of the controversy need not be citizens of the same state;[43] it is sufficient if they are all citizens of states other than those of which the opposite party is a citizen;[44] and the fact that plaintiffs are citizens of different states does not prevent the removal of a suit against an alien.[45] There is a conflict of authority, however, as to whether a suit is removable where, although the citizenship of each and every plaintiff differs from that of each and every defendant, some of the parties on the same side of the controversy are citizens of a state or states and others are alien.[46] Thus, where some of the defendants were citizens and some aliens, in some cases the right to remove has been upheld,[47] and in others it has been denied.[48]

[b] Under the Removal Act of 1875, the removability of a suit by a nonresident citizen and an alien against a nonresident citizen of a state other than that of the citizen plaintiff was recognized. Carson v. Hyatt, 118 U. S. 279, 6 SCt 1050, 30 L. ed. 167.

[§ 147] 4. Arrangement or Alignment of Parties.[49] While under the Removal Acts prior to the Act of 1875, a contrary rule prevailed,[50] under the Act of 1875 and subsequent acts, in determining between whom the controversy exists or who are opposing parties, the court is not bound by the title of the cause or the form of the pleadings,[51] but may and should examine the record and, regardless of the formal places of the parties as plaintiffs or defendants, arrange them on opposite sides of the controversy, according to the facts, upon ascertaining the matter in dispute[52] and the actual interests of the party;[53] and the rule applies where an alien is a party,[54] and where a resultant realignment either defeats the right to remove,[55] or sustains such right.[56] The alignment of the parties in plaintiff's pleading will govern, however, where it appears that the parties are properly aligned by such pleading.[57]

What constitutes similar interest. The fact that the ultimate interest of two parties may be the same is not of itself sufficient to authorize their alignment on the same side,[58] and where one of such parties has taken a position antagonistic to the other, and is under the control of still another party, whose position is similarly antagonistic, the parties who otherwise would have a common interest should be aligned on opposite sides.[59]

Where several controversies are involved, the authority of the court to realign the parties as to one controversy has apparently been recognized, although some of the parties placed on the same side are adversary parties as to another and different controversy.[60]

In a garnishment proceeding in which the garnishee denies liability to the judgment debtor, the judgment creditor and the judgment debtor have been aligned on the same side.[61]

Stockholders' suits. In a suit by a stockholder of a corporation to enforce a right of the corporation, the corporation is properly aligned as a defendant where it takes a position antagonistic to plaintiff[62] and is under the control of another defendant;[63] but where the corporation or those in control of the corporation are not opposed to the object sought by plaintiff,[64] or where plaintiff is in control of the corporation,[65] the corporation ordinarily should be aligned with plaintiff.

Creditors' suits. In a suit by an attaching creditor to set aside certain judgments against the debtor, other attaching creditors who were joined as defendants have been treated as plaintiffs.[66]

Taxpayers' suits. In suits by taxpayers to prevent the levy of taxes and payments on bonds of political subdivisions of the state, public officers who are made defendants should under certain circumstances be realigned with plaintiff on the side opposite from defendant bondholders;[67] but a different rule has been applied in the case of a suit to cancel, or to prevent the performance of, a contract entered into by such a political subdivision, and realignment of such subdivision and its officers with plaintiff on the side opposite from the defendant contractor has been refused.[68]

In a suit in which the validity of a mortgage is in issue, ordinarily the mortgagor is aligned with the parties who are attacking the mortgage.[69]

In a suit by a cestui que trust to enforce a right, on refusal of the trustee to sue, the propriety of realigning defendant trustee with plaintiff has been recognized.[70]

Partition. The rule providing for realignment of parties has been applied so as to permit the removal of a suit for partition.[71]

[§ 148] 5. Real, Necessary, and Formal or Nominal Parties[72]

—a. In General. In passing on the right to remove, in general the courts consider the real parties[73] and only those who are indispensable or necessary parties;[74] and in this connection, an indispensable party has been defined as one who has such an interest in the subject matter of the controversy that a final decree cannot be rendered between the other parties to the suit, without radically and injuriously affecting his interest, or without leaving the controversy in such a situation that its final determination may be inconsistent with equity and good conscience.[75] So, in determining the question here involved, a party who is merely a nominal or formal party with no real interest in the controversy,[76] and, under certain circumstances at least, a party who while a proper, is not a necessary or indispensable, party to the controversy,[77] may be disregarded; and in general the suit is removable where the requisite diversity and other jurisdictional requisites exist upon omission from consideration of formal or nominal parties,[78] or other than necessary or indispensable parties.[79] Indispensable or necessary parties cannot, however, be disregarded,[80] and where such a party defendant is a citizen of the same state as plaintiff,[81] or is a resident of the state where the suit is brought,[82] or where such a party is an alien defendant and plaintiff is also an alien,[83] the suit is not removable. So, where plaintiff might have set up either a joint or severable cause of action, he may properly sue on the joint cause of action, even though his action in this regard prevents the removal of the suit.[84]

Bar by statute of limitations. The fact that the statute of limitations has run against defendant whose presence prevents removal does not authorize the elimination or disregard of such defendant.[85]

[§ 149] b. Disclaimer or Release of Interest and Default. It has been held or recognized that a party to the suit may not be disregarded in determining removability merely because he disclaims an interest in the controversy,[86] at least where it is apparent that an interest in property involved remains in such party;[87] but there is authority for the view that a party who has disclaimed interest may be disregarded;[88] and it has been held that where, after the suit is commenced, a necessary party defendant releases his interest in the subject matter of the suit, such defendant may be disregarded.[89]

Default in appearance or pleading. The fact that judgment by default for want of pleading or appearance has been taken against the defendant whose presence prevents removal does not permit the disregard of such defendant.[90]

[§ 150] c. Particular Parties or Persons—(1) United States and United States Officer. In view of the rule that the United States cannot be considered a citizen of any state,[91] there can be no removal on the ground of diversity of citizenship where the United States is a real party,[92] even though the citizenship of a United States officer against whom the suit is brought, if such citizenship could be considered, would furnish the necessary diversity,[93] such officer being regarded as a nominal party.[94] A United States marshal in a suit in his name on a forthcoming bond, for the use of attaching creditors, has been regarded merely as a formal or nominal party whose presence does not affect the removability of the suit.[95]

Director general of railroads and railroad agent. The rule that a removal may not be based on the citizenship of an officer representing the United States as a party has been recognized or applied in the case of suits against the designated agent for personal injuries resulting from the operation of a railroad during federal control.[96] By virtue of statute,[97] such an action against either the designated agent or the director general of railroads is removable where it would have been removable if there had been no federal control and the action had been against the railroad company which owned the railroad;[98] otherwise not.[99]

[a] Where the director general of railroads obtained a stay of proceedings in an action against him and a railroad company of the state in which the action was brought, on the ground that under his own order the action should be brought only against him, he should be regarded as a party only because of his control and management of defendant railroad company, and the action was not removable. Removability of suit to which state a party as arising under constitution or laws of United States in general see supra § 53.

meaning of the Removal Act,[2] if the state is the real party, the suit is not removable on the ground here considered.[3] So, removability has been denied where the state is both the nominal or formal and the real party,[4] and also where, although the state is the real party plaintiff, it is not a party to the record,[5] the state officer who brings the suit being regarded merely as a nominal party.[6] Where, however, the state has no real interest in the controversy,[7] and is merely a nominal or formal party,[8] or not an indispensable[9] party to the suit, its presence does not prevent removal where the required diversity of citizenship otherwise exists and the other jurisdictional requisites are present; and the right to remove will not be denied merely because the suit is brought by a state officer.[10] The view has been expressed that the interest must be one in the state as an artificial person,[11] and that the right to remove will not be denied merely because the state has a general governmental interest in a suit brought by state officers,[12] because, as an incident to the relief sought in a suit by state officers, certain penalties may be recovered for the benefit of a political subdivision of the state,[13] or because the state may, in certain contingencies, become liable for the costs of a suit brought by state officers.[14] So, the courts have declined to apply the rule prohibiting removal where a political subdivision of the state as plaintiff has an independent interest in the controversy,[15] notwithstanding the state also has an interest;[16] and it has been laid down broadly that the mere fact that the state would be the beneficiary of a recovery in a suit by one of its political subdivisions duly authorized to sue, did not affect the right to remove.[17]

Constitutionality of statute, the enforcement of which is sought. There is authority for the view that a public officer, who brings a suit in the name of the state to enforce a statute which is violative,[18] or which defendant in good faith claims to be violative,[19] of the federal constitution, is the real party plaintiff, that the suit is removable where the requisite diversity of citizenship exists between such officer and defendant and the other jurisdictional requisites are present,[20] and that in such case a decision of the state court that the state is the party plaintiff is not binding on the federal court.[21] It has been held, however, that the principle involved in the rule so laid down has no application, where the state is itself acting in its sovereign capacity and is the only nominal and real party in interest.[22]

State officer as defendant. A state officer has been regarded as more than a mere nominal party and his citizenship as an individual has been given effect in a suit to impound certain property in his hands, of which property, in his official capacity, he holds title as trustee.[23] Where, however, the state officer has no real interest in the controversy, it has been held that his presence as defendant does not prevent removal.[24]

[§ 152] (3) Political Subdivision of State, and Officer of Such Subdivision. In accordance with general rules,[25] and in view of the rule that ordinarily a political subdivision of a state is regarded as a citizen within the rules as to removal,[26] the presence of such a political subdivision as a necessary party must be given effect in determining the question of removability;[27] but its presence may be disregarded where it is merely a nominal party and not a necessary party.[28] A public officer against whom no relief is sought except an injunction against an official act in aid of an act of another defendant, as to which an injunction is also sought, has been regarded merely as a formal party whose presence may be disregarded in determining the question of removability;[29] but it has been held that in a suit by an assignee for the benefit of creditors to protect the trust and to enjoin a deputy sheriff from selling the assigned property, the deputy sheriff was not a mere formal party within the rule here under discussion.[30]

[b] Officer of court.—In a suit to restrain a sale under a decree of court, the officer appointed by the court to make the sale was regarded merely as a formal party. Carver v. Jarvis-Conklin Mortg. Trust Co., 73 Fed. 9.

[§ 153] (4) Corporation and Persons Connected with or Dealing with Corporation.[31] Under general rules[32] a corporation has been regarded not as a formal party, but as a necessary party whose presence must be given effect in determining the removability of a suit by a stockholder or stockholders of such corporation to avoid a contract or other transaction of the corporation,[33] of a suit by a stockholder to recover for the corporation secret profits which, it is alleged, were obtained in the promotion or organization of such corporation;[34] of a suit to enforce a judgment against a corporation by compelling contribution from stockholders of the corporation,[35] of a suit to compel the transfer to plaintiff, on the books of the corporation, of stock which stands in the name of, or is claimed by, a codefendant of the corporation,[36] and of a suit seeking the appointment of a receiver for, and the sale of the property of, the corporation.[37] On the other hand, under general rules stated above,[38] it has been held or recognized that where the corporation is not a necessary or indispensable party to a suit,[39] as, for example, a suit brought by a stockholder or stockholders of the corporation,[40] its presence as a party may be disregarded in determining the question as to removability.

Incorporators and stockholders. Where stockholders of a corporation are parties in their individual rights, their own citizenship, and not that of the corporation, governs, notwithstanding certain corporate matters may be involved;[41] and to a suit to enforce a judgment against a corporation by compelling contribution from its stockholders, any stockholder who applies to have determined the equitable share of the judgment indebtedness, for which he is liable, is a necessary party whose presence must be given effect.[42] On the other hand, the view has been taken that to a suit against a corporation to establish and enforce plaintiff's interest in respect of certain lands which certain incorporators and stockholders of such corporation had conveyed to it, such incorporators and stockholders were not necessary parties within the rules here under consideration,[43] and a like rule has been applied in respect of an incorporator who owned most, if not all, of the corporate stock, in a suit to enjoin certain acts of the corporation.[44]

Corporate officers, agents, or employees. Where, in suits involving directly or indirectly the affairs of a corporation, under general rules,[45] the presence of an officer or agent of the corporation who is the real,[46] or who is a necessary,[47] party, must be given

Higgins v. Baltimore, etc., R. Co., 99 Fed. 640. effect in determining as to removability. On the other hand, the presence of corporate officers, agents, or employees as parties may be disregarded in connection with the matters here under consideration where they are formal or nominal, and not necessary, parties,[48] as, for example, directors in suits by stockholders,[49] including suits to avoid certain transactions of the corporation.[50]

Person dealing with or controlling corporation. To a suit by a stockholder to avoid a contract or transaction entered into by the corporation, ordinarily the other party to such contract or transaction is regarded as a necessary party within the rules here under consideration,[51] and to such suit persons in control of the corporation may also be necessary parties.[52] So, in a suit by minority stockholders against majority stockholders in respect of acts detrimental to the corporation, involved in the control and ownership of the stock of another corporation, it was held that such other corporation was a necessary party.[53]

[§ 154] (5) Joint Stock Association, and Officer of Such Association. As already pointed out, a joint stock association as such is not a citizen within the rules here under discussion,[54] and an officer of such an association who may be a plaintiff[55] or defendant[56] in an action in favor of or against the individual members of the association is not a real party, but is merely a nominal party whose citizenship is immaterial.

[§ 155] (6) Stakeholder or Depositary, and Person Summoned by Trustee or Garnishee Process.[57] There is authority for the view that a mere stakeholder,[58] depositary,[59] or one summoned by trustee or garnishee process,[60] or in a similar position,[61] who has no interest in the controversy, is not to be regarded as such a necessary or indispensable party as to require that effect should be given to his presence as a party. A depositary,[62] a garnishee,[63] or other person indebted to another party to a suit[64] may, however, have such a relation to the controversy as to make him a necessary party to the suit, whose presence must be given effect, as where a depositary has certain active duties to perform in respect of the deposited property;[65] and it has been held that a party may not be regarded as a mere stakeholder where he specifically aligns himself with one of the claimants and asserts his intention to pay to such claimant unless otherwise directed by judicial decree.[66]

Interpleader. In an interpleader suit plaintiff has been regarded as a mere stakeholder whose presence as a party can be disregarded,[67] even though he has not paid the disputed fund into court.[68] There is, however, authority for the view that where a complainant files a bill against a citizen of the same state and other claimants who are citizens of other states, the cause cannot be removed to a federal court before the complainant has fully performed the duty required of him and has been discharged, for until that time he continues to be a substantial and necessary party,[69] and where a bank which was sued for a deposit interpleaded a claimant other than plaintiff, pursuant to statute, but retained possession of the fund and continued as a party, it was regarded as a necessary party whose presence must be given effect.[70] So it has been held that a defendant who filed a bill of interpleader asking for a discharge from liability and that one of the parties named should be restrained from proceeding against such defendant, must be regarded as a party to the suit.[71]

[§ 156] (7) Representative or Fiduciary, and Person Represented or Beneficiary[72]—(a) Trustee and Cestui Que Trust. A trustee vested with legal title to the trust estate who sues[73] or is sued[74] in his representative capacity is usually regarded as the real party and his citizenship, and not that of the cestui que trust, governs in determining the question as to removability.[75] Moreover a trustee who has legal title and whose presence is necessary in order that the relief demanded may be obtained,[76] the performance of whose duty is directly involved in the suit,[77] or whose trust is active and who has a power over the property directly involved,[78] is regarded as a necessary party and his presence must be given effect. So a trustee is a necessary party plaintiff in a suit to enforce a contract which he has entered into in his capacity as trustee.[79] The presence, however, of a trustee who is not a necessary or indispensable party has been disregarded,[80] as where the connection with the suit of a trustee who is sued in his representative capacity is collateral and subsidiary to the main issue.[81] So where a person has taken title to property for the benefit of himself and another, the necessity for giving effect to the citizenship of such other has been asserted both where such holder of the legal title has sued[82] or where he is sued,[83] and the residence or citizenship of a beneficiary, and not that of a mere agent or trustee whose authority is revocable at any time and who has no power coupled with an interest, will govern.[84]

[§ 157] (b) Executor or Administrator, Beneficiary, and Decedent. Where an executor or administrator sues or is sued in his representative capacity, his citizenship,[85] and not that of the beneficiaries or next of kin,[86] or that of the decedent,[87] governs, regardless of the state in which the appointment is made.[88] Moreover, executors have been regarded as necessary or indispensable parties defendant, whose presence must be given effect, to a suit to enforce a contract of suretyship entered into by their testator,[89] and also to a suit to set aside the will,[90] as has an administrator in a proceeding by the widow of the intestate to have a year's support set aside to her out of the intestate's estate.[91] On the other hand, it has been held that an administrator is a mere nominal party defendant whose presence does not affect the removability of a suit to enforce an alleged oral contract of decedent to devise and bequeath a share of his property to plaintiff,[92] and that the citizenship of the heirs as parties defendant governs.[93] So the executor of a deceased trustee named as such in a deed of trust has been regarded as a mere formal party defendant whose presence would not prevent the removal of a suit to enjoin the foreclosure of such deed.[94]

Action for wrongful death. While in an action for causing the wrongful death of the intestate, the citizenship of the administrator as plaintiff has been given effect,[95] in an action under a statute authorizing the personal representative to sue, but providing that the recovery shall inure to the exclusive benefit of persons of a specified class, the administrator as plaintiff has been regarded as a nominal party whose citizenship is immaterial,[96] the citizenship of the beneficiaries controlling,[97] even though they are not named as parties.[98]

[§ 158] (c) Guardian or Next Friend, and Ward. Where a guardian of an insane person was appointed in the state of which the insane person was a citizen, and in which the action was brought, it was held that in view of the terms of the statute under which the appointment was made, the citizenship of the insane person, and not that of the guardian, would govern in determining the question as to removability.[99] So the citizenship of the next friend or guardian ad litem of an infant,[1] or of a married woman[2] has been disregarded.

[§ 159] (d) Agent and Principal. An agent has been regarded merely as a formal or nominal, and not as a necessary, party plaintiff[3] or defendant[4] to a suit involving a transaction or controversy between the principal and the opposite party to the suit, and the presence of such agent has, therefore, been disregarded; and, where an agent and the principal are joined as parties defendant, the latter has been regarded as the real, and not as a nominal, party.[5]

[§ 160] (e) Receiver. Where a receiver sues[6] or is sued[7] in a representative capacity, his citizenship governs, regardless of the fact that the appointment was by the court of a state other than that of which the receiver is a citizen.[8]

[§ 161] (8) Landlord and Tenant.[9] While it has been held or recognized that in an action of ejectment the presence as a party defendant of a mere tenant at will who has no interest in the land,[10] and, under the practice of the state in which the action originated, the presence of a tenant for a term of years,[11] and also the presence of a lessee in an action of trespass to try title brought under a state statute,[12] may be disregarded, a tenant or lessee may have such an interest as to require that effect shall be given to the presence of such tenant or lessee as a party defendant in ejectment,[13] and a like rule preventing the disregard of the presence of the lessor as defendant in ejectment has been applied.[14] So a suit to set aside for fraud a conveyance to a lessor and also the lease, the lessee is not a mere nominal party, and his presence as a party defendant must be given effect,[15] and in a suit by a lessor to set aside the lease, the presence as a party defendant of the original lessee as a codefendant with the person holding under such lessee through intermediate transfers, has been given effect.[16] The removability of a proceeding to acquire by condemnation an interest in a railroad right of way held under lease has been denied where the necessary diversity did not exist between the petitioner for condemnation and the lessor corporation.[17] On the other hand in a proceeding to compel the granting of railroad switch connections, it has been held that the lessee corporation which held under a long term lease and had assumed the obligations of the lessor was the real party defendant whose citizenship would govern in determining the right to remove.[18]

[§ 162] (9) Insurer and Insured.[19] Where an insurance company pays part of a loss and joins with the insured to recover at law for the loss from the tort feasor, under code provisions abolishing the distinction between forms of actions at law and in equity and providing that every action shall be prosecuted by the real party in interest, according to some cases, the presence of the insurance company as a party must be given effect,[20] and a like rule has been applied in the case of an action by the insurer and the insured where the insurer has taken a written assignment from the insured;[21] but there is authority to the contrary even where a written assignment has been taken.[22] In a suit in equity by an insurance company which has paid on account of a loss, against the insured and another, in which the insurance company seeks to assert a claimed right of subrogation, and to recover from such other for the loss which, it is alleged, was caused by such other, the presence of the insured as a necessary party has been given effect.[23]

[§ 163] (10) Principal and Surety. In an action against a principal and surety on an obligation in respect of which both have assumed liability, the presence neither of the principal[24] nor of the surety[25] may be disregarded.

[§ 164] (11) Mortgagor or Pledgor. A mortgagor in a controversy as to the priority of liens upon mortgaged lands has been regarded as a nominal party where the validity of the liens is not in dispute,[26] and a like rule has been applied where by the suit it was sought to determine the ownership of a bond and mortgage.[27] On the other hand, a mortgagor who has parted with title to the property, but who remains liable for the mortgage debt, has been regarded as a necessary party to a suit to foreclose the mortgage and to recover a deficiency judgment, whose presence cannot be disregarded,[28] so a suit by the holder of bonds secured by a mortgage for the removal of the trustee under the mortgage, the mortgagee is an indispensable party whose citizenship must be given effect.[29] It has also been held that in a suit by a pledgee to foreclose the right to redeem pledged securities, the presence as a party of one claiming, under the immediate pledgor, the right to redeem, must be given effect although such pledgor was himself an intermediate pledgee and the original pledgor was a party.[30]

[§ 165] (12) Use Party. The state,[31] a state officer,[32] and a United States marshal,[33] to suits in its or his name for the use of another, have been regarded merely as nominal parties whose presence does not affect the removability of the suit. On the other hand, where the suit is brought for the use of a designated person on a nonnegotiable contract by the holder of the legal title,[34] or is brought, for the use of another, by the holder of the legal title to recover for the destruction of property,[35] the person in whose name the action is brought has been regarded as a real, and not a nominal party, while in the case both of the action on contract[36] and also of the action for the destruction of property,[37] the person designated as the one for whose use the action is brought has been regarded merely as a formal or nominal party, although the rule may be affected by local statutes as to who is the real party.[38]

[§ 166] (13) Parties Designated by Fictitious Names. While it has been held that defendants designated by fictitious names are to be treated as formal parties whose presence on the record does not affect the removability of the suit,[39] there is authority to the contrary.[40]

[§ 167] 6. Joint Cause of Action and Improper Inclusion or Joinder of Parties—a. Plaintiffs. Where it appears on the face of the bill that a person has been improperly joined with others as plaintiff, his citizenship may and should be disregarded in determining the right of defendant to remove,[41] and a like rule has been applied in respect of a single formal plaintiff where he institutes a fictitious action against a resident defendant and a nonresident defendant merely to permit the resident defendant to litigate in the state court a cause of action against the nonresident defendant.[42] Where, however, plaintiffs join in the assertion of a joint claim, the citizenship of each must be given effect.[43]

[§ 168] b. Defendants[44]—(1) In General. It has been laid down in general terms that where persons who are not proper parties have been joined as defendants,[45] as, for example, persons against whom no relief is prayed, and whose presence is not essential to a complete disposition of the controversy,[46] or persons whose joinder is fraudulent or sham,[47] the suit may be removed if the requisite difference of citizenship exists between plaintiff and the remaining defendant or defendants. Where, however, the citizenship, allegiance, or residence of one or more of several defendants against whom a joint cause of action,[48] sounding either in tort[49] or in contract,[50] is set up, is such as to prevent the existence of the necessary diversity, the suit is not removable notwithstanding plaintiff could have proceeded against the individual defendants severally,[51] unless the joinder of the defendant whose presence would prevent removal may be disregarded.[52] The foregoing rule preventing removal applies to an action at law where under the state or local law the joinder is proper,[53] even though the law as enforced in the federal courts may be to the contrary,[54] or where there is reasonable ground for doubt as to the question of the joint liability which plaintiff alleges, and the question is an open one.[55]

Motive or purpose of joinder. In the absence of fraud or bad faith[56] the motive of plaintiff in joining a defendant whose presence prevents removal is immaterial,[57] and plaintiff's joinder of such a defendant will prevent removal where the cause of action set up is joint even though the joinder was for the express purpose of preventing removal.[58]

[§ 169] (2) Failure To State Cause of Action. The holdings as to the effect, in the absence of a claim or showing of fraud or bad faith,[59] of plaintiff's failure, in attempting to state a joint cause of action against defendants, to state a cause of action against a defendant whose presence as a party would prevent removal, are not wholly reconcilable.[60] It has been asserted that in order that the presence of such defendant should prevent removal, plaintiff's pleading should show with at least reasonable clearness that a cause of action is set forth against such defendant,[61] and in many cases it has been held or recognized, apparently apart from a consideration of the effect of fraud or bad faith, that removal is not prevented by the mere joinder of such defendant if there is a failure to state a cause of action against him,[62] the state law, as interpreted by the highest court of the state, governing in respect of the statement of the cause of action,[63] and this rule permitting removal has been applied or recognized where no cause of action is stated against an employee joined as defendant with his employer,[64] and where no cause of action is stated against a lessor joined as defendant with his lessee.[65] In a few cases, however, it has been held or recognized that, in the absence of fraud or bad faith, a mere failure to state a cause of action against a defendant whose presence as a party prevents removal[66] and the fact that plaintiff's pleading is subject to demurrer for such failure,[67] or, at least, a mere failure, through inadvertence or want of skill, perfectly to state the facts constituting the cause of action,[68] will not constitute a basis for removal on the ground of diversity between plaintiff and the other defendant or defendants.

In the one case the defect may be remedied by amendment, and in the other the plaintiff has the right to have the question passed upon by the state court." Richardson v. Southern Idaho Water Power Co., supra.

[§ 170] (3) Fraudulent or Sham Joinder[69]—(a) In General. It is well settled that the presence of a party whom plaintiff has joined with fraudulent intent for the purpose of preventing removal may be disregarded in determining the question as to removability and will not prevent removal if all jurisdictional requisites otherwise exist.[70] Fraudulent or sham joinder may not, however, be predicated of the mere joinder of a defendant whose presence as a party prevents removal, where plaintiff has the right to join such defendant,[71] where there is reasonable ground for plaintiff's belief that the defendant whose presence would prevent removal is liable,[72] or where, according to some cases, the right to join defendants under certain circumstances is an open one in the state in which action is brought and there are reasonable grounds for plaintiff's belief that such right will be upheld,[73] even though the joinder is made to prevent removal,[74] and the defendant whose presence prevents removal,[75] or all defendants,[76] may not, in fact, be liable. On the other hand, where a defendant who has no real connection with the controversy is joined in bad faith, the suit may be removed if the requisite diversity exists between plaintiff and the other defendants and the other jurisdictional requisites exist,[77] whether or not the local law recognizes a joint liability,[78] whether or not the joinder is fair on its face,[79] and even though plaintiff's pleading in form sets out a joint cause of action against defendants,[80] as where plaintiff, with knowledge of the facts or with means to acquire such knowledge, makes misstatements of facts in order to state a joint cause of action;[81] and these rules have been recognized or applied in the case of a fraudulent joinder of an employee as a defendant in an action against his employer.[82]

[77] Wilson v. Republic Iron, etc., Co., 257 U. S. 92, 42 SCt 35, 66 L. ed. 144; Wecker v. National Enameling,

Necessity of fraudulent joinder of all defendants. The fact that a defendant is fraudulently joined does not give the right to remove where another or other defendants, whose presence, if given effect, will prevent removal, are joined, as to whom no claim of fraudulent joinder is made.[83]

Fraudulent inclusion of party to render cause removable. It seems that the presence of a defendant who has fraudulently been joined merely for the purpose of rendering a suit removable may be disregarded.[84]

Fraudulent joinder of defendant who seeks removal does not give the right to remove the suit.[85]

[§ 171] (b) Evidence as to Fraudulent Joinder. The burden of showing that the defendant, whose presence, if given effect, would prevent removal, has been fraudulently joined is on the party who relies on the existence of the alleged fraud to support the removability of the action.[86] The existence of such fraud may be shown from the surrounding circumstances.[87] It has been held or recognized, however, that the fact that a defendant is a person of small means,[88] or is insolvent,[89] or the fact, related to the preceding two circumstances, that a judgment against him cannot be collected,[90] or, according to some cases, that plaintiff does not intend to prosecute the action to a conclusion against a defendant,[91] is not of itself sufficient to show the existence of a fraudulent intent in joining such defendant. So, while the fact that plaintiff had discontinued, after removal, an earlier action against defendant who now seeks to remove, is a circumstance tending to show fraud in joining a defendant whose presence, if given effect, would prevent removal,[92] it is not conclusive;[93]

nor is the fact that a former suit was dismissed upon the filing of a petition to remove,[94] nor is the fact that there was an abortive attempt to dismiss the earlier action.[95] Where the evidence tends to show liability of the defendant whose presence prevents removal or is sufficient to take to the jury the question as to such liability, in general it is sufficient to show that the joinder was not fraudulent,[96] and the mere failure of the jury to return a verdict against such defendant does not show that the joinder was fraudulent.[97]

Consideration of pleading. The existence of fraudulent intent in joining a defendant, whose presence, if given effect, would prevent removal, may be based on the fact that plaintiff has made misstatements of fact in order to state a joint cause of action although he had knowledge of the facts,[98] or could have had such knowledge if he had made the inquiry that the law requires.[99] While it is generally recognized that the failure of plaintiff to state a cause of action against such defendant is at least a circumstance indicating a fraudulent or sham joinder,[1] and in some cases the view has been taken that the failure of plaintiff's pleading to show on its face a cause of action against such defendant is of itself sufficient to show fraudulent joinder,[2] there is authority for the view that while an inference of fraud may arise from such failure,[3] such failure has evidentiary value only,[4] and does not conclusively show fraudulent intent.[5] In such case the question as to whether a cause of action is stated depends on the state or local law,[6] and the court will not examine plaintiff's pleading closely enough to determine whether a flaw might be found in it on the interposition of a special demurrer.[7]

[§ 172] (4) Action against Employer and Employee.[8] The question as to the removability of actions in which a joint cause of action against several defendants is set up frequently arises in actions against employers and employees in which the residence or citizenship of the employee defendant is such that if his presence as a party is given effect the action would not be removable, and in accordance with general rules and subject to applicable qualifications and limitations,[9] such an action is not removable,[10] as, for example, where plaintiff seeks to enforce liability for injury resulting from joint and concurrent fault or action of all defendants.[11] This rule preventing removal has been recognized or applied where defendant employer is not charged with any act of concurrence or direction, but is charged solely as the principal or master for the alleged tort of the defendant employee,[12] as, for example, where the action is against a railroad company and its employee or employees,[13] including an engineer or conductor.[14]

[§ 173] (5) Action against Lessor and Lessee or Receiver of Lessee.[15] In accordance with general rules, and subject to applicable qualifications and limitations,[16] the removability, on the ground under consideration, of an action in which a joint cause of action sounding in tort is set up against the lessor and the lessee of certain property,[17] including the lessor and lessee of a railroad,[18] or against the lessor and the receiver of the lessee,[19] has been denied where the residence or citizenship of either defendant is such as to prevent removal if his presence as a party is given effect.

[§ 174] 7. Change in Personnel—a. Intervention.[20] Where the nature of the action prevents removal[21] the intervention of plaintiff's attorney to enforce his statutory lien does not render the action removable because of diversity of citizenship between the intervener and defendant.[22]

[§ 175] b. Elimination of Defendant by Plaintiff or Court. Where plaintiff voluntarily dismisses or discontinues as to a defendant or defendants whose presence prevents removal, the suit thereupon becomes removable where the necessary diversity exists between plaintiff and the remaining defendant or defendants, and the other jurisdictional requisites are present.[23] The rule is otherwise, however, in the case of a disposition of the suit as to the defend-

[a] Even though defendants dismissed appear to be necessary parties to the suit, it becomes removable by the remaining defendants where the jurisdictional facts are present as to them. Cuyler v. Smith, 78 Ga. 662, 3 SE 408.

[b] Dismissal at time of trial.—The dismissal by plaintiff of his suit as against the resident defendants, leaving only nonresident defendants, renders the cause removable where ant or defendants whose presence prevents removal, otherwise than by the voluntary act of plaintiff,[24] as, for example, where there is an involuntary dismissal or nonsuit,[25] a directed verdict,[26] the sustaining of a demurrer to the evidence,[27] or a judgment of reversal on appeal.[28]

Failure to serve process or to bring defendant into court. While the mere failure to serve process on the defendant or defendants whose presence prevents removal does not, it seems, render the suit removable where there was an attempted service,[29] according to some cases where plaintiff fails to serve process upon, or otherwise fails to bring into court, the defendant or defendants whose presence as a party would prevent removal, and proceeds or elects to proceed against the other defendant or defendants alone, the suit is removable provided there is the required diversity in respect of such other defendant or defendants and the other jurisdictional requisites are present,[30] and in some cases a like rule permitting removal has been applied even where there is nothing to show an election to proceed against such other defendant or defendants;[31] but the contrary view has been taken,[32] and it has apparently been held that such failure does not render the suit removable even where plaintiff has proceeded against such other defendant or defendants.[33]

[§ 176] 8. Suits on Assigned Chose in Action.[34] Under the Judiciary Act of 1875 it was held that the exception of suits by assignees, which could not have been there instituted by the assignors, from the original jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States, did not affect the right of removal;[35] but under the provisions of subsequent removal acts

[a] Removal by either party.—Under the Judiciary Act of 1875 the rule stated in the text applied whether removal was sought by plaintiff which limit the right to remove to suits of which the federal courts have original jurisdiction,[36] suits by an assignee of a chose in action, within such exception of suits by assignees,[37] cannot be removed on the ground that plaintiff and defendant are citizens of different states[38] or that one party is a citizen of a state and the adverse party an alien,[39] if the citizenship or allegiance of the assignor was such as to prevent a suit in the federal court if there had been no assignment. In a suit by an assignee, however, the term "chose in action" has been construed as not to include the claim on which action was brought, so that the foregoing rule preventing removal did not apply.[40] Where both the assignor and the assignee are citizens of states different from that of defendant, the statute and rule in question do not prevent removal,[41] nor, it has been held, do they prevent removal where the action is brought by the administrator of the assignee.[42] There is authority for the view that the whole case is removable where the complaint sets forth several causes of action, one of which is removable, although other causes are on assigned claims of which the federal court would not have original jurisdiction,[43] and this rule has been applied in a suit against an alien where some of the plaintiff's assignors were citizens and some were aliens.[44]

Consent to assignment. In a case arising under Removal Act of 1875 the view was taken that where defendant consented to the assignment, the citizenship of the assignor could be disregarded in a suit by the assignee.[45]

Assignment to prevent removal. An assignment of a cause of action to a citizen of the same state as that of which defendant is a citizen prevents the removal of a suit thereon to a federal court on the ground of diversity of citizenship, even though the assignment is made for the purpose of preventing removal.[46-47]

[b] Assignee made formal defendant but realigned as plaintiff.—The materiality of the citizenship of an intermediate assignor of a life insurance policy has been asserted in a suit by the administratrix of insured to recover on the policy and to determine the interest of the assignee of such intermediate assignor, in which suit the insurance company and such assignee were made defendants, the assignee, however, being realigned as a plaintiff because of his rights against the insurance company. McNulty v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co., 46 Fed. 305.

[c] Presumption as to citizenship of assignor president of assignee corporation.—It may not be presumed that the assignor, who was president of plaintiff corporation to which the assignment was made, was a citizen of the state of which plaintiff was a corporation. [d] Effect of statutory provisions as to venue.—(1) The residence of the assignor in respect of the judicial district has been given effect in directing a remand in a case in which both the assignor and the assignee were citizens of the same state, under the holdings now overruled (see supra § 10), which regarded the statutory provisions as to venue as jurisdictional to the extent of preventing removal, even though diversity of state citizenship existed, if the suit was not brought in the district of either plaintiff or defendant. Guaranty Trust Co. v. McCabe, 250 Fed. 699, 163 CCA 31 [certiorari den 247 U. S. 505 mem, 38 SCt 427 mem, 62 L. ed. 1240 mem]. (2) A like rule was applied where the assignor was a citizen of a different state from that of the assignee and suit was brought in the state of which the assignee was a citizen. Waterman v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 199 Fed. 667. (3) Even before such holdings as to the effect of the statutory provisions as to venue were overruled, however, in some cases the position was taken that the fact that the suit was brought in a district other than that of assignor or defendant did not prevent removal, provided there was diversity of citizenship between the defendant and both the assignor and the assignee. general rule is that the diversity of citizenship[52] and the nonresidence of defendant[53] must exist at the time the suit is commenced, and also at the time when the petition to remove is filed.[54]

[§ 178] J. Pleading or Record as Affecting Removability[55]—1. In General. In the absence of a claim or showing in the petition for removal of fraudulent or sham joinder[56] in which case the removability of the cause is determined upon the issue thereby raised,[57] and subject to the rules as to the effect of changes in the status or personnel of parties to the suit,[58] where the existence of diversity of citizenship depends on the nature or subject matter of the suit,[59] in general such question is determinable from the case made by plaintiff's pleading,[60] as, for example, where there is a question as to whether a defendant is a formal or a necessary party,[61] although it may become necessary to determine the question as to whether one is a formal or necessary party by a consideration of the nature of the suit as presented by the whole record.[62]

Joint cause of action. It has frequently been held or recognized that, in the absence of any claim or showing as to fraudulent or sham joinder,[63] where the question as to removability turns on whether plaintiff has relied on a joint cause of action against all defendants, such question is determinable from the case made by plaintiff's pleading,[64] and that, if the cause of action as stated in such pleading is joint, the suit is not removable where plaintiff and one defendant are citizens of the same state,[65] or one defendant is a resident of the state where the action is brought.[66]

Place of citizenship. While, in the absence of any contrary showing, the allegations of plaintiff's pleading as to the place of citizenship or residence may be given effect,[67] the omission from plaintiff's writ,[68] or pleading,[69] of any allegation as to the citizenship of the parties does not prevent removal on the ground of diversity of citizenship, as the omission may be supplied by the petition for removal.[70] On the other hand, the fact that plaintiff's pleading alleges that a party is a citizen of a specified state does not prevent defendant from showing that such party is a citizen of another state, and removing the cause on that ground.[71]

Designation or arrangement of parties. The designation of parties in the title of plaintiff's pleading will not govern if such designation is not supported by the allegations in the body of the pleading.[72] There is authority for the view that the designation of parties in the notice or summons will govern as to who are parties plaintiff even though in plaintiff's pleading, subsequently filed, there is a variance from the notice or summons in this regard.[73] As already pointed out, plaintiff's designation of a particular party as plaintiff or defendant is not conclusive and the court may realign the parties in accordance to their real interests and the subject matter of the suit.[74]

IX. SEPARABLE CONTROVERSIES

[By Eustace W. Tomlinson]

[§ 180] A. In General. While, under the provision of the statute relating to the removal of causes from a state court to a federal court that when in such a suit, the removal of which is authorized, there shall be a controversy which is wholly between citizens of different states and which can be fully determined between them, then either one or more of the defendants actually interested in such controversy may remove the suit,[78] there is authority for the view that removal of such a suit may be had by any one or more of defendants even though the suit involves only one controversy,[79] such statutory provision is ordinarily held to refer to a case in which there are two or more controversies, one of which is separable from the other or others,[80] and the general rule is that, in order to be removable by less than the whole number of defendants, the suit must be separable into parts, so that in one of them a controversy will be presented, wholly between citizens of different states, which can be fully determined without the presence of the other parties.[81]

Extent of removal. The removal of a suit by one or more defendants, under the statutory provision applicable to separable controversies, takes into the federal court the whole case, and not merely the separable controversy.[82]

Separable controversies and independent causes distinguished. Separable controversies are clearly distinguishable from separate and independent causes of action joined in the same suit for convenience of litigation.[83] In the latter class of cases each cause of action may be treated independently, and the defendant or defendants in one, who could remove the suit if the other defendants or causes had not been joined, may still do so;[84] but a removal of one of the causes does not carry with it the other causes involved in the suit.[85]

[§ 181] B. What Controversies Separable—1. In General. A controversy is separable, within the meaning of the statutes relating to the removal of causes from a state court to a federal court, where the right asserted against the defendant interested therein is separate and distinct from that asserted against his codefendants, so that it may be wholly determined between such defendant and plaintiff;[86] and it is not separable where full and complete relief cannot be afforded without the presence of all the parties to the suit.[87] Accordingly, where there is but one issue in the suit and can be but a single decree, there is no separable controversy;[88] and the fact that there are separate remedies against the several parties does not create separable controversies where the cause of action against each is the same.[89] Similarly, the mere fact that one of two or more defendants has not been served with process,[90] or has made default in appearing or pleading,[91] or has

American Surety Co., 218 Fed. 678 (recognizing the rule but holding that it could not be applied to a suit by a nominal plaintiff joining numerous independent causes of action, of some of which the federal court would not have jurisdiction); St. Louis, etc., R. Clifford, 133 Fed. 880, 67 CCA 52, 5 LRANS 49 (recognizing the rule, and holding that bill, brought by several creditors on behalf of the rest, to enforce a statutory liability of stockholders under a Colorado statute, by requiring them each to pay the full amount of the same to a master, to be applied upon the debts pro rata, together with such sums as might be collected from other stockholders, the remainder to be returned, does not present a separate controversy between plaintiff and any one of defendants, since the case clearly calls for a proportionate liability of all stockholders). And see cases supra note 86.

[a] Splitting cause of action into parts.—The statute authorizing the removal of causes where the controversies are separable does not contemplate the splitting up into parts of a cause of action which plaintiff is entitled to prosecute as a single suit, simply because a part of the cause might be fully determined between the parties before the court, leaving the other part to be thereafter determined in another independent suit. appeared and disclaimed,[92] or that a separate defense exists,[93] or that judgment has been rendered against one defendant before another or others have been served,[94] does not create a separable controversy; and no separable controversy is presented by the fact that two or more defendants are interested in separate parts of the same subject matter.[95] The separable controversy must be real and substantial, and not a mere fanciful claim which has no support in the allegations of the petition or bill;[96] and matters which are mere incidents to the principal subject matter of the suit do not present a separable controversy.[97] Where a separable controversy actually exists, however, it is immaterial what other controversies or grounds of action may be involved in the suit,[98] or what collateral issues are connected therewith.[99]

Joint and several suits. Where separate and distinct liabilities on the part of two or more defendants are alleged or shown by plaintiff's pleadings,[1] or where different relief is sought against the several defendants,[2] there is a separable controversy between each of them and plaintiff, even though the suit is made joint in form for the purpose or with the design of defeating removal, or, to adopt the somewhat loose terminology of some of the courts, the joinder is fraudulent;[3] and it has been held that, where defendants are sued jointly and severally, separable controversies exist,[4] but there is authority to the contrary.[5] A joint suit upon the same cause against two or more defendants, however, even though they might have been sued separately, is not separable,[6] unless the joinder of the parties is not

[c] Suit against principal and surety.—A suit against one as principal and another as surety on his bond involves but one controversy, and is not separable. St. Anthony v. Mason, 22 F. [a] Rule applied.—In a suit by stockholders and creditors, for an accounting by directors, of funds of a corporation, which the latter have unlawfully appropriated, the fact that plaintiffs hold stock of different classes and claims of different kinds does not make the controversy separable, although they might have severally prosecuted the suit which they properly brought jointly. action, so that if he has made it joint in character no separable controversy is presented, in the absence of fraud.[10] So where a petition or complaint on its face sets up a joint cause of action, and there is no showing of bad faith, the question of joint liability will not be tried in the removal proceedings, but the case must be deemed to be that which plaintiff has stated in setting forth his cause of action;[11] but the court must decide whether the allegations of the pleading show a joint or a several cause, regardless of plaintiff's opinion or conclusions.[12] The right to join defendants in the state court, and the question whether the petition or complaint states a joint cause of action against them, are to be determined according to the law of the state where the action was brought, and not according to the federal law.[13] The fact that defendants who might have been sued separately are jointly sued for the particular purpose of rendering the suit unremovable does not render the controversies separable or permit the removal of the suit by less than the whole number of defendants, since the motive of plaintiff is immaterial, in the absence of fraud.[14]

Failure to state cause of action against part of defendants. It has sometimes been said that where plaintiff's complaint, in a suit against two or more defendants, fails to state a cause of action against one or more defendants, a separable controversy exists between the other defendant or defendants and plaintiff;[15] but more usually such cases have been regarded as instances of fraudulent joinder,[16] or the parties against whom no cause of action is stated have been merely disregarded in determining whether diversity of citizenship exists.[17]

Where there is but a single defendant and a single plaintiff there can be no separable controversy;[18] but where there are two or more plaintiffs a plurality of defendants is not essential to the existence of separable controversies.[19]

Particular controversies which have been held to be separable within the meaning of the statute[20] or not to be so separable[21] may be found in the footnotes.

amended,[23] which must be taken as confessed,[24] and construed in the light of the state law,[25] without regard to pleadings filed after the application to remove,[26] and without regard to the judicial knowledge of the court;[27] and the allegations of the petition for removal are immaterial to the question of separability,[28] except, it has been stated, where the petitioner alleges a fraudulent joinder of defendants for the purpose of preventing removal.[29] In determining from plaintiff's pleadings whether or not a separable controversy is presented, the court will go to the essence of the suit, without regard to the pleader's conclusions, or the form in which he has cast his suit.[30]

Amendment of plaintiff's pleadings in such manner as to create a separable controversy where none had been originally presented renders the cause removable if the other jurisdictional facts exist.[31]

Defendant cannot create a separable controversy, and so render the cause removable, by pleading a separate claim, whether by cross bill, counterclaim, or otherwise, which is purely a matter of defense, or is directly connected with plaintiff's pleading or with the answer;[32] and the interposition by the several defendants of separate defenses will not make a suit removable as involving separable controversies,[33] even though one of them arises under the constitution or laws of the United States, if all the defendants are not interested therein.[34] Similarly, a defendant cannot render a cause separable and removable by setting up that plaintiff has no cause of action against his codefendant,[35] or that the right to sue such codefendant is barred by a statute of limitations.[36] One who is a necessary party to a suit, however, and who has not been made a defendant, may become a party to the cause and then remove it if his controversy with plaintiff is separable, where the other jurisdictional facts exist.[37]

[§ 183] 3. Particular Suits or Proceedings—a. Accounting. In a suit against two or more defendants, there are separable controversies, within the meaning of the statutes relating to the removal of causes from a court of a state to a federal court, where an accounting is prayed against one or more, but not all, of defendants, and there is an actual controversy between the other or others and plaintiff,[38] or where the complaint prays a joint and several accounting,[39] as by trustees for the fraudulent misappropriation of trust funds,[40] or where it prays separate accountings by different defendants,[41] unless such defendants are jointly liable or each is interested in the accounts of the others, in which case the controversy between them and plaintiff is not separable.[42]

[§ 184] b. Creditor's Bill or Similar Suit. Upon a creditor's bill for the collection and preservation of a debtor's assets and their application to plaintiff's debt or their distribution pro rata among the creditors, there is no separate controversy within the meaning of the statutes relating to the removal of causes from a state court to a federal court, between plaintiff and defendants who claim a prior lien upon the assets,[43] nor between him and defendants who he contends should be excluded from participating in the distribution,[44] nor between him and a defendant who is alleged in the bill to have assumed the obligations of the insolvent debtor.[45] The same principles have been applied to similar suits by an administrator[46] and by an assignee for the benefit of creditors,[47] and to a suit by a partner for a dissolution of the partnership and the distribution of its assets.[48]

[§ 185] c. Condemnation Proceeding.[49] A separable controversy, within the meaning of the statutes relating to the removal of causes from a court of a state to a federal court, exists between the petitioner and each of the owners of property involved in a proceeding to condemn land for a public use, when the only question in dispute is the amount of damages, and the respondents have no joint interest in any of the parcels to be condemned, nor in the damages to be awarded,[50] except when a state statute directs that the proceedings against all of the respondents shall be tried together, and that a single finding be made including all the awards and all the assessments for benefits, in which case no separable controversy can exist.[51] There is, however, no separable controversy with the petitioner as between two or more respondents to such a proceeding who have separate interests in the same property,[52] as in the case of a lessor and lessee,[53] although where only a part of the property has been leased the controversy as to the part not leased is separable as between the lessor and lessee.[54]

Where petitioner's right to condemn is in issue, as such, there is but a single controversy between him and all those who dispute his right;[55] but where the issue is merely as to his right to condemn particular property his controversy with the owners of such property is separable from the controversy between him and the owners of the other property sought to be condemned.[56]

the other parties.[68] So there is no separable controversy in such a suit where one of two defendants is sued as trustee for the other,[69] or where defendants are mortgagor and mortgagee,[70] or where all the defendants are charged with a conspiracy to cloud plaintiff's title or defraud him of his property;[71] but the mere fact that the bill alleges that all parties defendant make some claim under a particular deed does not make the controversies inseparable where the validity of such deed is not the only matter in issue.[72]

[§ 188] f. Suit To Set Aside Conveyance or Cancel Mortgage. In an action to set aside a conveyance to which action the grantor and grantee in such conveyance are defendants, there is no separable controversy with plaintiff as between such grantor and grantee, within the meaning of the statutes relating to the removal of causes from a state court to a federal court,[73] or as between the grantor and his trustee in bankruptcy,[74] nor is there a separable controversy between plaintiff and a subsequent grantee of the property;[75] and, similarly, in a suit to cancel a mortgage there is no separable controversy with plaintiff as between the mortgagor and mortgagee.[76]

[§ 189] g. Foreclosure Suit. In a suit to foreclose a mortgage or other lien, a defendant who is alleged to be personally liable for a deficiency has no separable controversy, within the meaning of the statutes relating to the removal of causes from a state court to a federal court, from that between plaintiff and the owner of the equity of redemption;[77] and defendants sued as junior encumbrancers cannot remove a foreclosure suit on the ground that their controversy with the mortgagee is separable from that of the mortgagor,[78] even though, it has been held, they contest the validity or priority of the mortgage,[79] but on this point there is authority to the contrary.[80] Where, however, in a suit to foreclose a mortgage the avoidance of a prior mortgage is prayed, the controversies are separable.[81] A prayer for the reformation of the mortgage sought to be foreclosed is merely incidental to the foreclosure, and so does not create a separable controversy.[82] But where the property covered by the mortgage is in dispute, the controversy between plaintiff and defendants who are interested in the disputed portion of the property is separable.[83]

[§ 190] h. Suit for Specific Performance. In a suit for the specific performance of a contract for the sale of land, brought against the vendor and one to whom he has subsequently conveyed the property, there is a separable controversy between plaintiff and such grantee.[84]

[§ 191] i. Proceeding in Probate.[85] In proceedings upon an application for the admission of a will to probate,[86] or to contest its validity,[87] or in an action to establish a will,[88] or a suit to determine the construction thereof,[89] there is no separable controversy, within the meaning of the statutes relating to the removal of causes from a court of a state to a federal court.

[§ 192] C. Who May Remove. A plaintiff cannot in any case remove a cause from a state court to a federal court on account of the existence of a separable controversy.[90] Any one or more of the nonresident defendants interested in a separable controversy may remove the cause;[91] but a defendant not interested therein cannot do so.[92] An intervener,[93] or a party brought in on the motion of plaintiff[94] or defendant,[95] may remove because of a separable controversy, when the necessary difference of citizenship exists between him and the party on the opposite side thereof, provided he presents some new and independent interest or question; but not otherwise.[96] One whose application to intervene has been denied ordinarily has no standing to remove the cause or controversy;[97] but one who shows himself clearly entitled to intervene, and who has wrongfully been denied permission so to do, may be regarded as a party for the purposes of obtaining a removal.[98] It has been held that the joinder, in an application for removal on account of a separable controversy, of a party not entitled to such removal with parties who have a right to remove does not defeat the removal, such joinder being treated as a nullity.[99]

[§ 193] D. Citizenship and Residence of Parties as Affecting Removability. Inasmuch as the statutory provisions now under consideration authorize the removal thereunder of such controversies only as are wholly between citizens of different states and can be fully determined between them,[1] a separable controversy to which an alien is a party, whether as plaintiff[2] or defendant,[3] cannot be removed under such provisions; nor can one to which a state is a party.[4] For the same reason, there can be no removal under such provisions where an indispensable party to the controversy is a citizen of the same state as any party on the side opposite to him;[5] but the citizenship of a party who, although proper, is not indispensable to the controversy will not prevent such removal.[6] Furthermore, the rule appears to be well established that a defendant who is a resident of the state where the suit is brought cannot remove a separable controversy under the statutory provisions now being considered;[7] but there is some authority, to the contrary, that the residence of defendant is not material.[8]

X. PREJUDICE OR LOCAL INFLUENCE[9]

In General. The earliest statute specifically authorizing removal because of prejudice or local influence,[10] as reënacted in substance in the United States revised statutes[11] was repealed by the Removal Act of 1887–1888.[12] The act of 1887–1888 contained provisions covering the same subject matter,[13] which in some respects narrowed the right to remove given by the earlier act,[14] and these provisions in all material respects were the same as those contained in the present removal act[15] which provides that where a suit is brought in any state court, in which there is a controversy between a citizen of the state in which the suit is brought and a citizen of another state,[16] any defendant, being such citizen of another state,[17] may remove such suit into the district court of the United States for the proper district,[18] at any time before the trial thereof,[19] when it shall be made to appear to said district court[20] that from prejudice or local influence[21] he will not be able to obtain justice[22] in said state court, or in any other state court to which the said defendant may, under the laws of the state, have the right, on account of such prejudice or local influence, to remove said cause.[23] The statutory provision in question does not furnish a separate and independent ground of federal jurisdiction,[24] but is a special case of removal on the ground of diversity of citizenship.[25]

Purpose and source of statute. The first statute[26] specifically authorizing removal for prejudice or local influence was enacted because of the conditions in various communities resulting from the Civil War.[27] The statute is intended to carry out more effectively the purpose of the constitutional provision that the judicial power of the United States shall extend to controversies between citizens of different states,[28] by securing for such controversies a tribunal independent of local influences and surroundings.[29]

[§ 195] B. Validity and Construction of Statute in General.[30] The constitutionality of statutes providing for removal on the ground of prejudice or local influence has been recognized.[31] In referring to the original act providing specifically for removal because of prejudice or local influence the view was expressed that it was remedial and therefore should be given a liberal construction in favor of removal,[32] but the contrary view was also expressed,[33] and, as already pointed out, later statutes narrowed in some respects the right to remove given by the original act.[34]

[§ 196] C. Suits Removable.[35] Subject to the general rule that a suit may not be removed unless it originally could have been brought in the federal court,[36] and to the rule that the requisite jurisdictional amount must be involved,[37] the right to remove under the statute in question applies both to actions at law[38] and to suits in equity.[39]

Suit on assigned chose. While under the Act of 1867, the statutory provision denying original jurisdiction to federal courts of suits on assigned choses in action if there would not have been jurisdiction if no assignment had been made did not apply so as to prevent removal,[40] it would seem that under the present statute, in view of the holdings as to suits on assigned choses in action in the ordinary case of attempted removal for diversity of citizenship,[41] there can be no removal if the citizenship of the assignor is such as would prevent a suit in the federal court if no assignment had been made.[42]

[§ 197] D. What Constitutes Prejudice or Local Influence or Obtaining Justice, and Matters Considered—1. In General. The prejudice or local influence which the statute makes a ground for removal may relate either to the person of the litigant or the subject matter of the litigation;[43] but in either case there must exist improper bias, partiality, unreasonable predilection, or hostility in the local community or courts, which will work injustice, or prevent the party seeking a removal from obtaining justice.[44] It does not mean, however, merely a prejudice or influence primarily against the party who seeks removal;[45] but includes as well prejudice or local influence favorable to his adversary.[46]

[a] "Prejudice" or "local influence" compared.—"The term 'local influence,' if not synonymous with 'prejudice,' manifestly refers to an improper influence exerted by or existing in favor of one side, or against the other, which will prevent the latter from obtaining justice in the state courts." Adelbert College v. Toledo, etc., R. Co., 47 Fed. 836, 844 [app dism 146 U. S. 354, 13 SCt 281, 36 L. ed. 1002] (per Jackson, J.).

[45] Neale v. Foster, 31 Fed. 53, 12 Sawy. 424.

Prejudice or influence affecting either judge or jury. The right to remove is not confined to cases in which the prejudice or local influence may affect a jury, but includes also cases in which prejudice or local influence may affect a judge;[47] therefore, the right to remove may extend to a case in which the only questions involved are questions of law,[48] and also to a case in which, as a result of the waiver of a jury trial, a judge alone will try the case.[49] The view has been expressed that it is presumed that the state judge will be affected by the existence of prejudice or local influence in the community[50] and that where prejudice or local influence exists in the community, it is sufficient regardless of the probable ability of the state judge to resist such influence.[51] The fact, however, that the federal judge who will try the case is a member of the community in which the prejudice or local influence exists will not defeat the right to remove.[52]

"Justice," which the defendant must be prevented from obtaining in the state court, in order that he may remove, is not a judgment or decree,[53] or any other particular result[54] in his favor, but it refers to the "influences" which will operate on the state tribunal in deciding the case.[55]

Prejudice or local influence as between defendants. A defendant cannot remove where the only prejudice or local influence he relies on is between himself and another defendant.[56]

Existence of right of appeal to an unprejudiced state court is not sufficient to prevent removal.[57]

[§ 198] 2. Provision for Change of Venue. While there is authority for the view that removal for prejudice or local influence may not be had where defendant may move for a change of venue, and it does not appear that the same prejudice or local influence exists in the counties to which the change can be made, even though the right to such change is not absolute under the state statute,[58] the contrary view has been taken;[59] in any event, the right to remove has been upheld where an application for a change of venue had been denied.[60] Where prejudice and local influence of the judge of the state court, as well as prejudice and local influence of the community, is relied on and made to appear, and under the state practice such judge might have tried the case in any county to which the case might have been removed, removal may be had.[61]

[§ 199] 3. Particular Matters Considered or Sufficient. Prejudice or local influence favorable to the adversary of the party who seeks to remove the case may, according to some cases, appear from the fact that such adversary is long resident and favorably known in the community,[62] and also from the fact that such adversary has influence in respect of political matters in the community.[63] Matters or circumstances which have been regarded as tending, or sufficient, to show prejudice or local influence in the particular case are the display of animus of citizens of the community against parties to the suit at a public meeting,[64] or otherwise by public denunciation;[65] statements of a local administrative officer criticizing parties to the suit;[66] a recommendation by the grand jury that one of the parties should not oppose the suit;[67] disorder and display of animus toward the party who seeks to remove, in connection with previous litigation in which such party was involved;[68] the fact that many leading and influential members of the community maintain that they were defrauded in the transaction out of which the litigation grew;[69] and expressions of the desire of many members of the community for the success in the suit of the adversary of the party who seeks to remove, based either on the influence of such adversary or on dislike for the party who seeks to remove.[70] On the other hand, the fact that decisions of the state court upon the question in controversy differ from those in the federal court,[71] or that decisions of the state court are not favorable to the party who seeks to remove,[72] does not constitute prejudice or local influence. So it has been held that the fact that local newspapers have, in connection with the controversy, denounced the party who seeks to remove is not of itself sufficient.[73]

[72] In re Breckenridge, supra.

Temper and character of judge before whom the suit would be tried in the state court is, according to some cases, a matter to be considered,[74] but a mere remark of a local judge, in connection with the litigation, in line with his duty, which cannot be regarded as showing bias on his part, is not sufficient to show the requisite prejudice or local influence.[75]

[§ 200] E. Requirement that Parties Be Citizens of States.[76] A suit to which an alien,[77] a citizen of a territory or of the District of Columbia,[78] or a member of an Indian tribe who is not a citizen of the United States,[79] is a party cannot be thus removed.

[§ 201] F. Necessity for Diversity of Citizenship. Subject to rules permitting the disregard of parties under certain circumstances,[80] as in the case of removal on the ground of diversity of citizenship in general,[81] in the case of removal for prejudice or local influence it is necessary that all the parties on one side of the controversy shall be citizens of different states from the parties on the other side.[82]

[§ 202] G. Citizenship of Plaintiff. In contrast with an ordinary case of removal on the ground of diversity of citizenship,[83] in order that a suit may be removed because of prejudice or local influence the plaintiff must be a citizen of the state in which the suit is brought,[84] and where there are several plaintiffs, all must be citizens of such state,[85] upon the alignment of the parties according to the subject matter and their actual interests.[86]

[§ 203] H. Time When Requisites as to Citizenship and Interest Must Appear. As in the ordinary case of removal on the ground of diversity of citizenship,[87] the requisite diversity of citizenship[88] and noncitizenship of defendant in the state in which the suit is brought[89] must exist both when the suit is commenced[90] and also when the petition to remove is filed;[91] but under the act of 1867[92] the view was taken that the fact that, pending suit and before he applied to remove, plaintiff became for a time a citizen of the state in which the action was brought did not prevent removal by him where he was a citizen of another state when suit was commenced and when application to remove was made.[93] It has been held that a defendant who seeks to remove must have the requisite interest in the litigation when removal is sought.[94]

[§ 204] I. Who May Remove, and Joinder in Removal.[95] Subject to the rules heretofore and hereinafter stated,[96] under the present removal act a citizen defendant may remove on the ground of prejudice or local influence.[97] Only a defendant, however,[98] who is a necessary party to the suit and not merely a formal party without interest, personal or representative,[99] and who is a citizen of a state other than that in which the suit is brought,[1] may remove; plaintiff cannot remove[2] unless, according to some cases, he may be regarded as defendant for the purpose of removal when the original defendant sets up a counterclaim.[3]

Corporation. The right of a corporation[4] to remove for prejudice or local influence in a proper case has been recognized or upheld.[5]

Added parties. The right of an intervenor to remove for prejudice or local influence in a proper case has been upheld.[6] A purchaser pendente lite of property involved in the suit, who is brought in as defendant by a proceeding ancillary to the main suit is, however, subject to all disabilities, as to removal, of the party under whom he claims,[7] and an intervening defendant who comes into the suit merely to assist in the defense and to protect himself from a liability to indemnify the original defendant, cannot remove if the original defendant cannot.[8]

Alien may not remove under the statute in question.[9]

Member of Indian tribe who is not a citizen of the United States cannot remove.[10]

Where there are several defendants, all defendants must be citizens of a state or states other than that in which the suit is brought,[11] except where any defendant who is a citizen of the state in which suit is brought is merely a nominal party[12] or is interested with plaintiff adversely to defendant;[13] but it seems that if removal is otherwise permissible, one defendant may remove without the joinder of his codefendants.[14]

XI. TIME OF REMOVAL[15]

[By Eustace W. Tomlinson]

[§ 205] A. In General. Inasmuch as the right to remove a cause from a court of a state to a federal court depends wholly upon the statutes providing therefor,[16] removal may be had only within the time prescribed by such statutes,[17] which is, in the case of suits arising under the constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States,[18] or suits involving diversity of citizenship, but not involving prejudice or local influence,[19] at the time or before defendant is required by the laws of the state or court rules to answer or plead;[20] and in the case of suits of which removal is sought on account of prejudice or local influence,[21] or suits between persons claiming land under grants from different states,[22] at any time before the trial thereof;[23] and in the case of suits against persons denied civil rights,[24] or suits or criminal prosecutions against revenue officers or persons acting under them or holding property by title derived from them, or against officers of the federal courts or of either house of congress,[25] or suits and prosecutions against officers, soldiers, or other persons in the military service of the United States,[26] or, it would seem, suits by aliens against civil officers of the United States,[27] at any time before the trial or final hearing thereof.[28] Proceedings for a removal are taken in time where the removal papers are actually filed within the time limited by law, although the filing is not then endorsed upon them,[29] or although they are not presented to[30] or acted upon by[31] the court until after the statutory time to remove has expired, the approval of the court relating back to the time of filing the papers;[32] but presentment to the court within the time limited by the statute is not sufficient where the papers are not filed until after the expiration of such time.[33] A suit cannot be removed after it has been dismissed,[34] nor after a stipulation admitting plaintiff's claim has been filed, where there is no other controversy in the suit.[35] Proceedings to obtain a removal are not, of course, too early because commenced earlier than necessary under the statutes.[36] An application for removal filed after the expiration of the statutory time is ineffectual,[37] unless objection to the tardiness is waived by the opposite party.[38]

Before service or pleading. A defendant may remove the cause before he has been served with process,[39] or before he has filed any pleading or answer,[40] and an irregularity in filing removal papers before the entry of an order making the remover a party to the cause is cured by the subsequent entry of such order which recites the filing of such papers;[41] but this principle does not authorize one not a party to the record to remove a cause.[42]

During vacation of state court. It has been held that removal may be had while the state court is in vacation;[43] but there is also authority for the contrary view.[44]

Cause not originally removable. Where a cause is not originally removable, but becomes so at a subsequent time,[45] as by a dismissal as to all but nonresident defendants,[46] or by a substitution of parties,[47] or by failure to prove allegations rendering the cause unremovable,[48] proceedings for removal should be taken at once, although defendant will not be deemed to have lost his right to remove where he has no actual knowledge of the act or pleading rendering the cause removable, even though constructive notice thereof is to be presumed,[49] and the prior expiration of the time within which proceedings for removal would have had to be taken but for such subsequent act or pleading does not prevent removal where a right to remove the cause so arises or appears.[50] The fact, however, that defendant's misconception of the law, under which he believed a cause which was in fact removable not to be so, is subsequently corrected by a judicial decision handed down in another cause does not entitle him to remove the suit after the proper time therefor has expired.[51]

Extension of time.[52] After the time for removing a cause has expired, it cannot be extended by the court,[53] even though the failure to remove within the statutory time resulted from unavoidable accident.[54]

Revival of right after lapse. The intervention of a new party cannot revive a right of removal by one of the original parties, which right has lapsed by failure to exercise it within the proper time.[55]

Burden of showing timeliness of a proceeding to obtain a removal is upon the party seeking to remove the cause, if objection is made that the proceedings were taken too late.[56]

Waiver of objection to tardiness.[57] Plaintiff in a suit may waive any objection to a failure on the part of defendant to remove the cause within the time prescribed by statute,[58] as by consenting that an application for removal may be made at a later time,[59] or by proceeding in the federal court without raising the objection.[60] A waiver comes too late, however, after trial and verdict or decision in the state court.[61]

[§ 206] B. Removal at or before Time To Answer or Plead—1. In General. The statute providing for the removal of causes from a state court to a federal court at or before the time defendant is required by the state law or the rules of the state court to answer or plead[62] is imperative with respect to the time for removal,[63] as determined from the state statutes and rules of court relating to the time for answering or pleading.[64] Accordingly, a cause cannot be removed, under such provision of the removal statutes, after the time to demur has expired,[65] although a demurrer has been overruled with leave to defendant to answer,[66] nor after the time to file the first pleading, whether going in abatement or to the merits, has expired,[67] even though defendant has the right to amend as of course within a specified time.[68] So long, however, as the time within which defendant must answer or plead has not expired, the right to removal is not lost by mere delay.[69] Thus where no valid service of process has been made upon defendant,[70] whether or not he had actual knowledge of the suit,[71] or where his default has been set aside for failure to serve a copy of the complaint with the process,[72] the time for removal ordinarily does not run, and a removal may be had after the opening of a judgment taken by default against a defendant who had not been properly served;[73] but where there are two or more defendants and the time for removal has expired as to one, the other cannot remove the cause, although he has not been served, provided he was named as a party in the bill or complaint and provided there is no separable controversy.[74] An intervener cannot remove a suit where his intervention takes place after the expiration of the original defendant's time to remove;[75] but where, after the expiration of the time within which the original defendant might have removed the cause, another party is brought in by amendment, his right of removal is not lost,[76] except where he is merely substituted for and takes the place of an original party defendant,[77] and except in the case of a purchaser pendente lite of property affected by the suit.[78] In determining whether or not a removal has been effectuated in time, a federal court will not take judicial notice of a rule of the state court extending or limiting the time prescribed by state statute for pleading or answering.[79]

Curtailment or extension of time for removal.[80] The fact that defendant pleads before the time at or by which he is required to do so does not shorten the time for removal,[81] nor does the denial of a motion to strike the bill from the files,[82] nor an appearance and argument in opposition to a motion for an injunction pendente lite,[83] a receiver,[84] or any other provisional remedy,[85] even though an appeal has been taken to a higher state court from the ruling upon such motion.[86] Similarly, an order overruling a demurrer does not curtail the time within which the cause may be removed, where the time within which defendant is required to plead has not expired;[87] but the time to answer, and therefore the time within which removal may be had, runs while the demurrer is pending.[88] On the other hand, the time for removal is not extended by filing a plea to the jurisdiction of the state court[89] or a motion to quash the service of the summons,[90] nor by an omission to enter a default,[91] nor by the fact that defendant's at-

[§ 207] 2. Extension or Curtailment of Time To Answer or Plead[94]—a. Extension. There is marked conflict among the decisions as to whether or not an extension of the time to answer or plead in a suit brought in a state court enlarges the time for removal of the cause to a federal court, under the statute providing for removal at or before the time defendant is required to answer or plead.[95] Thus it has been held that where defendant's time to plead or answer is, before its expiration, extended by an order of the state court,[96] or by a stipulation authorized under the state statutes or court rules,[97] the time for removal of the cause is thereby similarly extended; but in both the former[98] and the latter[99] circumstances the weight of later authority appears to be to the contrary. In any event, an ex parte order[1] or an oral stipulation[2] extending the time to answer or plead, where not authorized by the state practice, will not extend the time for removal. Moreover, after the expiration of the time to plead, the time for removal cannot be extended by an order opening defendant's default and allowing him to plead,[3] although under the facts the right to have the default opened is given defendant by statute.[4]

[§ 208] b. Curtailment.[5] A state court cannot, by ordering a defendant to answer or plead within a time shorter than that prescribed by statute or rule of court, curtail the time within which he may remove the cause to a federal court under the statute providing for such removals at or before the time defendant is required by the laws of the state or the rules of the state court to answer or plead.[6]

[§ 209] 3. Effect of Amendment of Petition or Complaint. If a cause not originally removable is made so by an amendment to plaintiff's petition or complaint,[7] as where he omits some of the original parties so as to create a diversity of citizenship,[8] or increases the sum or value in dispute above the jurisdictional amount,[9] or shows that the suit arises under the constitution or laws of the United States,[10] or if defendant sued in a representative capacity is by amendment made a party in his personal capacity,[11] defendant's right to remove, under the statute providing for removal at or before the time defendant is required to answer or plead, continues until defendant must plead to the amended pleading. The same rule applies where by amendment an entirely new cause of action is set up,[12] and, similarly, where by amendment or a subsequent pleading by plaintiff a separable controversy is made to appear for the first time, the cause is removable by the defendant interested in such controversy, although the time for removal has otherwise expired;[13] but an amendment effecting no change in the cause of action does not extend the time for removal.[14]

[§ 210] C. Removal before Trial. Under the statutes permitting the removal of causes from a state court to a federal court before the trial,[15] a removal may be effected only before the first trial of a suit,[16] and a mistrial because of a disagreement of the jury,[17] or an order for a new trial of the cause,[18] does not extend or enlarge the time for removal. Moreover, the cause may be removed only before the first step in the trial is taken.[19] So it is too late to remove after a jury has been called or accepted,[20] even though not yet sworn,[21] or after the case has been called for trial and a motion for a continuance has been made and overruled,[22] or after time has been granted defendant to present an application for a continuance[23] or to procure counsel,[24] or after defendant has consented to a reference in order to prevent an immediate trial.[25] It is the duty of a defendant who desires to remove a cause to proceed so to do before the suit is reached for trial,[26] and the state court is under no obligation to delay a trial in order to enable defendant to prepare a petition for removal.[27] An attempt to begin the trial of a cause before it is properly triable in the regular course of procedure,[28] however, or the transfer of a cause to another part of the court for hearing on a motion, upon objection made when the case is called for trial that it is not ready,[29] is not such a step in the trial as to terminate the right of removal. The fact that the trial might have been had at an earlier term or time does not prevent the removal of a suit at any time before trial is in fact begun.[30]

Massachusetts Bonding, etc., Co., 295 Fed. 153; Parker v. Vanderbilt, 136 Fed. 246; Detroit v. Detroit City R. Co., 54 Fed. 1.

Under former statute see infra text and notes 44–47.

Default. The entry of a default is a trial, within the meaning of the statute.[31]

Demurrer. Although there is authority to the contrary,[32] it is the general rule that a hearing upon a demurrer is a trial within the meaning of the removal statutes.[33]

Injunction or receivership. A hearing and ruling upon a motion for an injunction[34] or a receiver[35] is not a trial, so as to put an end to the time for removal, where the relief sought is merely temporary and provisional in character; but where a receiver is appointed by a final decree adjudicating the rights of the parties there has, of course, been a trial so that the right of removal no longer exists.[36]

Probate proceeding. It has been held that it is not too late to remove a proceeding pending in a state court upon appeal from a decree admitting a will to probate, where the court in which such appeal is pending has the right to try the cause de novo;[37] but otherwise it is too late to remove such a proceeding after decree and appeal.[38]

Award of commissioners or arbitrators. The statutory provision requiring removal before trial does not prevent the removal of a proceeding after an award of arbitrators,[39] or after the decision of a board of county commissioners on a claim against their county,[40] or after an appraisal made by commissioners in a condemnation proceeding,[41] where the acts of such arbitrators or commissioners are nonjudicial or administrative in character.[42]

Cross suits. Where cross suits are brought involving the same rights and subject matter, the parties only being reversed, one of such suits cannot be removed after trial of the other, since the causes must be deemed to be so identical that whatever is done in one will bind the parties in both suits.[43]

Removal before or at term at which cause could be first tried, and before trial. Under the statute, formerly in effect, providing for removal of cause before or at the term at which the cause could be first tried, and before the trial thereof,[44] proceedings for removal could be had only before or at the first term at which there was an issue for trial, whether or not the parties and court were ready to try it.[45] Where the next regular term of the court after a suit was at issue was not held, an application for removal made subsequent to the time fixed for holding such term but before the next term was in time, since the next term would be the first at which it could be tried.[46] An intervener who came into the suit after the term at which it could have been tried as between the other parties, but before trial had been had, was not too late to remove the suit.[47]

[§ 211] D. Removal before Trial or Final Hearing. The trial or final hearing contemplated by the statutes providing for the removal of suits or criminal prosecutions from a state court to a federal court before the trial or final hearing thereof[48] is a trial or hearing of the cause upon its merits, as distinguished from a hearing upon interlocutory matters;[49] and a ruling upon a demurrer[50] or the reversal by an appellate court of an order for a reference, and a remand of the suit to the inferior court for trial,[51] is not a trial or final hearing within the meaning of the statute. As to what trial or hearing on the merits is final, however, the courts are not in entire accord.[52] Thus there is authority for the view that, where a trial or hearing on the merits has been had, the right to remove the cause is not extended or continued by the fact that the trial resulted in a disagreement of the jury,[53] or that a right of appeal from or review of the judgment or decision exists.[54] It has frequently been held, however, on the contrary, that a removal may be taken after a jury on the first trial has disagreed,[55] or after the unsuccessful party in a trial or hearing has performed all the conditions precedent to the right to obtain a new trial,[56] or after a new trial has been ordered,[57] or where an appeal has been taken which, under the state law, vacates the judgment or decision and removes the case into the appellate court for trial de novo,[58] although there can ordinarily be no removal pending an undecided motion for a new trial[59] or an undecided appeal,[60] nor after the appellate court has ordered an accounting before a master,[61] or has directed the lower court to enter a decree in conformity with its opinion,[62] nor, after a removal by the appellate court, where the time has not expired within which a rehearing may be obtained.[63] A hearing before commissioners to whom a matter has been referred by the trial court is not a final hearing, within the meaning of the removal statutes, where their report is subject to affirmance or rejection by the court.[64]

XII. WHO MAY REMOVE[66]

[By William G. Bannon]

[§ 212] A. In General. In general a person who is not a party of record,[67] and who is not entitled to be made a party,[68] cannot remove the suit.

[§ 213] B. Capacity. The view has been taken that where the necessary jurisdictional facts exist, an infant defendant may remove a case through his next friend or guardian ad litem, in the same manner and under the same circumstances as any other defendant;[69] but it has been laid down that neither an infant nor his guardian ad litem nor any one else acting on behalf of the infant can consent to a change of forum.[70] Where a wife's interest in certain property had vested in her husband as such, it was recognized that his interest was such as to permit him to remove in a proper case.[71]

A corporation which has been dissolved has the capacity to remove a suit, if the right to remove otherwise exists, where the law of the state under which it was incorporated perpetuates the corporate existence of such a corporation for the purpose of prosecuting or defending suits by or against it;[72] and it has been held that a like rule applies to a corporation adjudged insolvent, where the corporate entity still exists.[73]

[§ 214] C. Plaintiff or Defendant—1. In General. Under the present removal act, except in the case of a suit between citizens of the same state claiming lands under grants by different states, which suit may be removed by any one or more of plaintiffs or defendants,[74] defendant only may procure a removal.[75] By all acts of congress governing removal, however, the right to remove is given to defendant where all other jurisdictional requisites are present,[76] and the rule that only a defendant or defendants may remove must be considered in connection with the holdings as to who are, or may be treated as, the real defendant or defendants.[77]

Transfer by owner of property to permit removal.

It has been held that, in the absence of fraud or collusion, the right of defendant to remove a condemnation proceeding is not defeated by a claim that, prior to the commencement of the proceeding, the property involved was transferred to defendant for the sole purpose of creating the right to remove.[78]

[§ 215] 2. Who Is Defendant—a. In General. It has been stated in general terms that in determining whether or not a certain party is defendant and as such entitled to remove, the court will look behind the position of the parties in the title of the cause or proceeding,[79] and into the nature of the proceeding and the relation of the parties to the issues and controversy.[80] A party named as a defendant may not, however, properly assert the necessity for a realignment of the parties, which would result in giving such party the status of a party plaintiff, and thereby acquire a right to remove.[81]

[§ 216] b. Cross Bills, Cross Complaints, or Counterclaims against Original Parties.[82] The holdings and views as to whether, upon the filing of a cross bill or counterclaim, the original plaintiff may be treated as a defendant in respect of the cross bill or counterclaim and so entitled to remove, are conflicting.[83] In a case arising under the Judiciary Act of 1789 the supreme court took the position that the interposition, under a state code provision, of a defense coupled with a prayer for an injunction and general relief did not permit plaintiff to remove the cause,[84] and in subsequent cases in lower federal courts and in state courts arising under the present removal act or under statutory provisions in substance the same as such act, it has been held or recognized that the pleading by the original defendant of a cross bill, a counterclaim, or a demand in reconvention, which exceeds the jurisdictional amount,[85] does not put the original plaintiff in the position of a defendant so that he can remove the cause.[86] There are, however, cases in the lower federal courts, including very recent cases, some of which have sought to distinguish the above holding of the supreme court made under the Judiciary Act of 1789,[87] in which it has been held or recognized that, upon interposition of a cross bill or counterclaim, in substance the original defendant is plaintiff[88] and the original plaintiff is defendant[89] for the purposes of removal, and that the original plaintiff may remove the suit if the other jurisdictional

"The language of the opinion in West v. Aurora, 6 Wall. (U. S.) 139, 18 L. ed. 819, is broad enough to support defendant's motion to remand. The decision itself is not. In the first place, the removal statute then required the defendant to remove 'at the time of entering his appearance,' and this it did not do. Again, the record was so fragmentary that it was impossible to tell whether the paragraphs in the answer were, properly speaking, a counterclaim at all, and the court said that the state of the record was 'fatal to the supposed right of removal.' In its opinion the court spoke of the allegations of the answer as 'in the nature of defensive pleas, coupled with a prayer for injunction and general relief.' If they were 'defensive pleas,' the question here presented was not before the court." San Antonio Suburban Irrigated Farms v. Shandy, 29 F. (2d) 579, 580.

[a] Cross bill in condemnation proceeding.—Where a landowner, appellant in condemnation proceedings under the Iowa statute, filed a pleading in the nature of a cross bill in equity, praying for affirmative relief, the adverse party became defendant as to such pleading and was entitled to remove the cause, where the requisite grounds appeared. Hagerla v. Mississippi River Power Co., 202 Fed. 771.

requisites are present, some of the cases basing the conclusion, at least to some extent, on the general rule, affecting removability for diversity of citizenship,[90] requiring the court to realign the parties according to the real matter in controversy.[91] While it has been held that a defendant does not change his status as such so as to lose his right to remove, by filing a cross-bill in which a codefendant is made a party defendant,[92] an original defendant against whom his codefendant files a cross complaint may remove where the other jurisdictional requisites are present.[93]

[§ 217] c. Intervener and Party Brought In after Suit Commenced.[94] The status of an intervener as defendant with resultant right to remove has been recognized where he specially intervenes as defendant and in his pleading contests the plaintiff's claim to the property involved,[95] and also where he should originally have been made a party defendant and the original plaintiff and original defendant join in attacking the intervener's claim of interest in property involved in the suit.[96] So a new party, brought in by cross bill or cross complaint, against whom defendants seek affirmative relief, not involved in the original proceeding, may remove for diversity of citizenship where the other jurisdictional requisites are present;[97] and a like rule has been applied in respect of removal by an assignor where, in a suit by the assignee alone, defendant set up a counterclaim by which he sought to recover from the assignor.[98] There is, however, authority for the view that an intervener, whose ground for intervention is to enforce his own claim and only incidentally to oppose that of plaintiff, may not be regarded as defendant,[99] that a party who is brought in as a result of defendant's allegation that the party so brought in is a necessary party, and who claims under plaintiff, is not to be regarded as a defendant but as a plaintiff and cannot remove,[1] and that where defendant seeks to implead and to recover over against a third party for any sum for which the original defendant might be held liable, such third party cannot remove if the original defendant does not set up sufficient facts to charge such third party with liability.[2]

[§ 218] d. Condemnation Proceeding.[3] In condemnation proceedings the owner of the land involved is regarded as defendant[4] on a so-called appeal to the state court from a decision of commissioners or a sheriff's jury,[5] even though the state statute technically makes such owner a plaintiff,[6] and as defendant, the landowner is entitled to remove provided all other jurisdictional requisites are present.[7]

[§ 219] e. Proceeding To Assess Benefits and Damages Resulting from Local Improvement.[8] The landowner has been treated as defendant with the right to remove, in proceedings under certain state statutes, to assess benefits and damages to land resulting from a local improvement,[9] as where the landowner appeals to the state court from the action of administrative officers fixing the assessment.[10] defendant,[26] or all defendants[27] may remove if such defendant or defendants are nonresidents of the state where the suit is brought.

Construction of statute in general. There appears to be some conflict as to the meaning of the phrase "being nonresidents" of the state in which the action is brought, as used in the removal act.[28] The view has been expressed that, in order to be a nonresident, defendant must be a citizen of another state or a corporation created by the laws of another state,[29] and there is authority for the view that where plaintiff and defendant are citizens of the same state the fact of residence of defendant outside such state does not give the right to remove.[30] In some cases, however, the courts have apparently recognized a distinction between "nonresidence" and "noncitizenship," in the case of a natural person, in holding that such a person, although apparently recognized as a citizen of one state, may be regarded as a resident of the state in which suit is brought against him so as to prevent removal by him for diversity.[31] The court has granted a motion to remand an action by a citizen of one state against a citizen of another state brought in such other state where both were residing abroad and neither had a residence in the United States, on the ground that the jurisdiction of the federal court on removal for diversity was doubtful.[32]

Citizen defendants considered collectively. Where the right to remove a suit against several citizen defendants depends on residence outside the state in which the suit is brought, defendants must be taken collectively or as an entity,[33] and a nonresident defendant cannot remove where another defendant is a resident,[34] notwithstanding there is diversity of citizenship between all plaintiffs and all defendants.[35]

Alien a party. Under the statutory provision preventing removal by a resident defendant of the state in which the suit is brought, the view has been taken that a resident alien cannot remove a suit against him by a citizen;[36] but there is authority to the contrary.[37] The statutory provision in question prevents the removal of a suit by an alien against a citizen who is a resident of the state in which the suit is brought,[38] removal by an alien joined as defendant with a resident citizen,[39] and removal by a nonresident citizen joined as defendant with resident citizens in a suit by an alien.[40] An alien corporation is not prevented from removing, as defendant, a suit by a citizen on the ground that it is not a nonresident merely because it has an office, and engages in business, in the state where suit is brought.[41]

Corporation organized under state law. In determining the question as to removability by a defendant corporation where diversity of citizenship exists, in general the corporation is regarded as a resident of the state by which it is incorporated,[42] and where the suit is brought in such state it cannot remove;[43] and a corporation incorporated in one state does not become a resident of another state in which suit is brought so as to prevent removal on the ground of diversity of citizenship merely because it does business in such other state,[44] notwithstanding it was organized to do business in such other state.[45]

[§ 226] D. Right of Added Party in General.[46] In general a party who is substituted for another party,[47] or who is otherwise brought into the suit,[48] and a purchaser pendente lite of property involved in the suit who is brought in,[49] or who intervenes,[50] is subject to all the disabilities of the party whose place he takes or under whom he claims, in respect of removal. It has been held, moreover, that a person who intervenes merely to assist in the defense of the suit and to protect himself against liability for indemnifying the original defendant, is subject to the disabilities of such defendant,[51] and that an intervener who is a proper but not a necessary party to the suit cannot remove;[52] of course, where removal is sought on the ground of diversity of citizenship, the intervener cannot remove where the necessary diversity does not exist.[53] It has been held or recognized, however, that a party, not chargeable as a purchaser or assignee pendente lite, who intervenes,[54] or who is brought in,[55] and who is the real party defendant, may remove where all the jurisdictional requisites are present. By special statute,[56] where the United States has appeared in a suit to which a restricted member of the Five Civilized Tribes in Oklahoma, or a restricted heir or grantee of such Indian, is a party, the United States may remove such suit to the federal district court.[57] There is authority for the view that a person who has been wrongfully denied the right to intervene should be regarded as a party in respect of the question as to removal by him,[58] but a person not a party to the record[59] who has not been permitted to intervene and has not applied to intervene cannot remove;[60] and where there was no impropriety in a refusal to substitute or bring in as a party a person not originally named, such person cannot remove.[61]

[a] Parties not nominal parties.—Where a draft on a county treasurer, forwarded by a school district for collection, was paid by the county treasurer by check on a national bank which later suspended, the dis-

[§ 231] 5. Diversity of Citizenship or Allegiance—a. In General. Aside from any question as to separable controversy[72] and removal for prejudice or local influence,[73] and subject to the rules as to disregarding parties under certain circumstances[74] and to rules hereinafter stated,[75] where the sole ground of the removal is that the only controversy in the suit is between citizens of different states, the preponderance of authority supports the proposition that all the parties named in plaintiff's pleading, who are on the opposite side of the controversy to him, must join in the application.[76]

[§ 232] b. Suits in Which Aliens Are Parties in General. Under the present removal act it seems that suits to which an alien is a party cannot be removed, unless all the parties on the opposite side of the controversy to that of plaintiff join in the application.[77]

[§ 233] c. Party Not Served with Process and Not Brought into Court.[78] Where one or more of several defendants sued on a joint cause of action which is removable,[79] have been served with process or otherwise brought into court, the defendant or defendants so served or brought in may remove even though the other defendant or defendants who were not served or brought in do not join,[80] and, according to some cases, after such other defendant or defendants have been served, he or they may elect whether the case shall remain in the federal court or shall be remanded.[81]

[§ 234] d. Nominal or Formal, Improper, and Unknown Parties.[82] It has been held or recognized that failure to join in the application to remove, on the part of nominal or formal,[83] or unnecessary and improper[84] parties, or on the part of defendants who are described in plaintiff's pleading as unknown,[85] is not of itself sufficient to prevent removal.

trict could join the county treasurer, receiver of the suspended bank, and the collecting banks in one suit by reason of the common interest in the questions of law and fact, and such receiver could not remove the cause as arising under the laws of the United States on the theory that other defendants were mere nominal defendants and need not join in the petition to remove. Lynchburg First Nat. Bank, 95 Va. 480, 28 SE 909 (where, however, the cause was not removable in any event).

[a] In a case arising under Judiciary Act of 1789 (1) the view was expressed that where all defendants in a suit in which the judgment or decree must be joint, were aliens, one defendant who had entered an appearance could not remove the cause and thereby give the federal court jurisdiction on the merits (Ward v. Arredondo, 29 F. Cas. No. 17,148, 1 Paine 410), (2) but the application to remove need not have been made by all defendants at the same time, in view of the statutory provision requiring that the application to remove must be made at the time of entering appearance in the state court (Ward v. Arredondo, 29 F. Cas. No. 17,148, 1 Paine 410).

[a] "The reason for this rule is that in such a case the defendant served is the sole defendant subject to the general jurisdiction of the state court. XIII. PROCEDURE FOR REMOVAL

[By Eustace W. Tomlinson]

[§ 235] A. In General. Inasmuch as the right to remove a cause from a state court to a federal court is purely statutory,[86] in order to effect a transfer of jurisdiction all the requirements of the statute prescribing the procedure therefor must be complied with;[87] and the necessity of such compliance cannot be obviated by stipulation or consent of the parties.[88] Where no objection to the proceedings is made by a party, however, the federal court will not of its own motion inquire as to the regularity of the means by which the removal was effectuated.[89]

Second application.[90] Where an application for removal has been made and denied, no second application can be made on the same ground.[91] Where an application for removal is made while a former application is pending and not yet acted upon, a removal may be had, if at all, only upon the second application.[92]

[§ 236] B. Causes Removable on Application to State Court—1. Mode of Making Application—a. Suits Arising under Federal Constitution, Laws, or Treaties, or Involving Diversity of Citizenship—(1) In General. It is provided by statute that a party entitled to remove a cause from a state court to a federal court on the ground that it arises under the federal constitution, laws, or treaties, or because of diversity of citizenship, but not on account of prejudice or local influence,[93] may do so by filing in the suit in the state court a petition and bond for removal, giving written notice thereof before filing the same.[94] The method of removal so prescribed is exclusive,[95] and a removal on such ground cannot be granted on a petition to the federal court to which the cause is sought to be removed.[96]

[§ 237] (2) Petition—(a) In General. The petition, required by statute,[97] for the removal from a state court to a federal court of a suit arising under the constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States, or in which there is diversity of citizenship, is indispensable to proceedings to effect a removal of such a suit,[98] and a mere motion to remove is not sufficient.[99] Moreover, a petition showing a right of removal on one ground will not justify removal on another.[1] The petition cannot usurp the function of a demurrer,[2] and does not have the effect thereof, as searching the record.[3]

Form and sufficiency. The petition for removal, being in essence a written application addressed to the state court for the removal of the cause to the federal court,[4] should state facts which justify a removal and give jurisdiction to the federal court to which the removal is sought,[5] at least in so far as such facts do not already appear in the record,[6] and should specify the ground relied upon for removal;[7] but it need not show that the time for removal has not expired.[8] The facts should be stated specifically and positively,[9] and not left to inference,[10] nor should they be stated merely upon information and belief[11] or by way of conclusion;[12] but no precise or technical form is required.[13] A general allegation in the language of the statute is insufficient.[14] The petition must aver that the suit was duly commenced in the state court,[15] and should state specifically that a controversy exists between the parties,[16] but it need not allege that the petitioning party has a just cause or defense.[17] It seems that the petition should allege that proper notice of its filing has been given,[18] but the omission of such allegation does not invalidate the petition.[19] A petition by a foreign corporation need not allege that it has a permit to do business in the state.[20] The petition may assail, as false and fraudulent, allegations of plaintiff's bill or complaint which prima facie would prevent removal;[21] but allegations which amount merely to a traverse of the facts alleged in plaintiff's pleadings are not sufficient.[22]

Defects and omissions. A petition for the removal of a cause which in substance shows good ground for removal is not to be denied merely because it imperfectly alleges a jurisdictional fact,[23] and a petition which alleges facts from which the removability of the cause appears is not fatally defective merely because it is based upon an erroneous ground,[24] or the prayer refers to a wrong statute,[25] or asks removal to a division of the federal district which does not exist, but correctly designates the city where the court in one of the divisions is held,[26] or omits proper punctuation, where the meaning is nevertheless clear.[27] Similarly, a petition showing the existence of a separable controversy which renders the cause removable is not bad because it prays only for removal as to the petitioners instead of for the removal of the whole cause.[28] An omission from the petition of a jurisdictional fact will be cured, if such fact appears in an accompanying affidavit,[29] or on the face of the record of the state court;[30] but where a cause is remanded to the state court on account of a defect in the petition for removal, an allegation in an amended bill or complaint, subsequently filed, does not cure such defect.[31] A petition for removal by fewer than the whole number of defendants is fatally defective, in the absence of any showing of a separable controversy or that the other defendants are merely formal or nominal parties.[32]

But see Woolridge v. McKenna, 8 Fed. 650 (holding that a petition alleging a right to removal on the ground of diversity of citizenship is not sufficient to give jurisdiction to the federal court to retain the cause when the transcript shows that the suit was removable only because arising under the constitution and laws of the United States, since the allegata and probata must correspond).

Execution. A petition for removal may be signed either by the petitioner or by his attorney in fact or in law;[33] and where the petitioner is a corporation, execution of the petition in its behalf by one upon whom original process in the cause was served as the duly authorized agent of the corporation is sufficient.[34]

Verification. Under the express requirements of the statute,[35] the petition for removal must be verified;[36] and a petition which is not verified is properly denied.[37] The necessity for verification applies, of course, only to statements of fact.[38] An affidavit that the allegations of the petition are true to affiant's own knowledge, except such as are therein stated on information and belief, and as to such matters that he believes them to be true, is a sufficient verification,[39] even though neither the petition nor the verification shows which matters are stated on personal knowledge and which, if any, are upon information and belief;[40] and a verification stating merely that the affiant "verily believes" the matters stated in the petition to be true has been held sufficient.[41] Verification by the attorney for the petitioner is ordinarily sufficient,[42] especially where the petitioner is a corporation.[43] A defective verification may be ordinarily corrected by filing an amended affidavit.[44]

Mode of attacking petition.[45] Objection to a defective or insufficient petition for removal may be made orally, and need not be in writing.[46] A petition which is insufficient on account of the failure to allege an essential fact may be attacked by demurrer;[47] but it is equally proper for the party resisting removal merely to submit the application on the defective petition.[48] The want of a proper verification cannot, however, be raised by a general demurrer.[49]

Waiver of objection. Merely formal and modal defects in a petition for removal are waived by failing to object thereto.[50] Thus the omission to sign the petition is waived unless objection on the ground thereof is made in the state court.[51]

Conditional petition. A petition requesting a removal of the cause upon a particular contingency, as in case a pending motion shall be denied or a plea in abatement not sustained, is bad.[52]

Second removal. When a cause has been removed and remanded, the original petition for removal is functus officio and so cannot be used as the basis of a second removal when plaintiff's pleadings are so amended that a right to remove the cause appears,[53] but a new petition, addressed to the amended pleading, is necessary.[54]

[§ 238] (b) Allegations as to Particular Matters—aa. Difference of Citizenship—(aa) In General. When the removal of a cause from a state court to a federal court is sought by a nonresident defendant on account of difference of citizenship,[55] the petition for removal must show both that such nonresidence and difference of citizenship existed at the commencement of the suit,[56] and that they still exist at the time when the petition is filed,[57] unless such facts appear in the pleadings or elsewhere on the record of the state court;[58] but nonresidence and citizenship may ordinarily be stated as conclusions, without setting forth the facts upon which they depend.[59] It has been held sufficient to allege merely that defendant is, and at the commencement of the suit was, an alien or a citizen of another state than that in which the suit was brought, without also alleging that he is a nonresident of the latter state;[60] but there is authority to the contrary.[61] A showing that the citizenship was diverse at a time prior to the commencement of the suit is not sufficient, although it is also shown to be diverse at the time of filing the petition;[62] but a petition for removal filed by an intervener simultaneously with his petition of intervention is sufficient when it alleges a difference of citizenship in the present tense.[63] The citizenship of each defendant should be separately alleged.[64] It is not sufficient to allege that a copartnership[65] or the board of trustees of a state institution[66] is a citizen of a designated state, without naming the members individually, or that a party suing or sued in a representative capacity is in such capacity a citizen of a specified state.[67]

Osborne, supra; Bilby v. Hancock, 58 Tex. Civ. A. 365, 125 SW 370). (3) The better practice, however, required that the petition be verified (Kansas City, etc., R. Co. v. Daughtry, 138 U. Mere description of a party as a citizen of a designated state, without alleging that he is such citizen, is not sufficient;[68] nor is a designation or description of him as "of" a specified state or place,[69] since such description at the most amounts to no more than a statement of his residence.[70]

Allegation of residence. An allegation, in a petition for removal, of a party's residence in a designated state, without an allegation of his citizenship,[71] or an allegation that he "lives" or "lived" in a specified city and state,[72] is insufficient unless it is also alleged that he is a citizen of the United States, in which case it will be presumed that he is also a citizen of the state of his residence, in view of the Fourteenth Amendment to the federal constitution.[73] An allegation that the state of which a party is a resident is unknown is insufficient to show that his citizenship is different from that of another party.[74]

Alienage. The alienage of a party is not sufficiently shown by an allegation merely that he is an alien,[75] but the petition should show that he is a citizen or subject of a specified foreign state or ruler.[76]

An allegation in the latter form is ordinarily sufficient;[77] but if the facts shown cast doubt upon his alienage, such allegation, being a mere conclusion, is insufficient.[78]

Suit by assignee. A petition for the removal, on the ground that the citizenship is diverse, of a suit brought by the assignee of a cause of action must allege a diversity of citizenship between defendant and the assignor.[79]

[§ 239] (bb) Citizenship of Corporation.[80] Where a suit to which a corporation is a party is sought to be removed from a state court to a federal court on the ground of difference of citizenship,[81] the petition for removal should state that such corporation was organized or created by, or under, the laws of a specified state or foreign government,[82] such an averment being ordinarily a sufficient showing of its citizenship;[83] and an allegation merely that it is a citizen of,[84] or is located[85] or has its principal place of business[86] in, a designated state, is insufficient. Similarly, it is not sufficient to allege merely the residence of the corporation,[87] especially in view of the rule that an allegation of residence is not a sufficient allegation of citizenship.[88] On the other hand, where the creation of a corporation by, or its organization under, the laws of a designated state or country is sufficiently pleaded, it is unnecessary to allege specifically its citizenship,[89] or that it had the same citizenship at the time of the commencement of the suit as when the petition is filed;[90] and where it is alleged to have been created by or under the laws of another state or of a foreign country, it is unnecessary to aver that it is not a resident of the state in which the suit is brought.[91]

Where corporation is chartered in two or more states[92] the facts showing the diversity of citizenship between it and the adverse party must be specifically alleged.[93]

Municipal corporation. Where a party to the suit is a city or incorporated town of the state in the courts of which the suit is pending, a petition for removal describing it as such, without alleging that it was incorporated under the laws of the state, has been held sufficient to show its citizenship,[94] since the court will take judicial notice of the facts.[95] It is, however, preferable that the citizenship be specifically alleged.[96]

[§ 240] (cc) Fraudulent Joinder. Where a nonresident defendant seeks the removal from a state court to a federal court, on the ground of diversity of citizenship, of a suit which in form is jointly against such nonresident and one or more resident defendants, but in which such residents are claimed to have been fraudulently and improperly joined for the purpose of preventing removal of the suit,[97] the petition for removal must set forth affirmatively and by specific allegation facts sufficient to show that the joinder was made fraudulently or in bad faith,[98] or, as has been said, which compel that conclusion,[99] apart from petitioner's deductions,[1] at least unless the fraudulent character of the joinder is apparent upon the face of the bill or complaint.[2] It is not sufficient to charge generally, or by indefinite averments, that the joinder is fraudulent or for the wrongful purpose of preventing removal,[3] or to aver in terms that the case is removable or belongs to one of the classes of causes enumerated by the removal statute,[4] or to allege that the resident defendants were joined under a conspiracy to prevent a removal, without a statement of facts showing the existence of such a conspiracy.[5] Similarly, an allegation in the petition that the resident defendant has no interest in the controversy,[6] or, where the action is one for damages for negligence, a mere denial of the joint negligence,[7] or an averment that the resident defendant was not a party to the alleged negligence,[8] or that he is financially irresponsible,[9] or, in an action against a master and his servant, a denial that the resident servant was acting within the scope of his employment,[10] is insufficient to raise the issue of fraudulent joinder. But an allegation that the statements of plaintiff's petition charging joint or concurring negligence on the part of defendants were untrue, and that their untruth was known to plaintiff, is a sufficient allegation that the joinder was fraudulent.[11]

federal court is sought upon the ground that the suit arises under the constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States,[18] the petition for removal should state the facts showing that it does arise thereunder;[19] and a petition stating merely the conclusion that the suit is one so arising is insufficient.[20]

[§ 243] cc. Amount or Value in Controversy. Where the removability of a suit from a court of a state to a federal court is in part dependent upon the amount or value in controversy,[21] the petition for the removal of such suit should show that such amount or value exceeds the sum specified by the removal statutes,[22] and that it exceeded such sum at the time the suit was commenced.[23] Allegations only as to such amount or value at the time the petition is filed are insufficient to entitle defendant to a removal.[24] The existence of a controversy involving the requisite amount or value may ordinarily be alleged in general terms, in the absence of any showing in the record to the contrary,[25] and in a suit for an injunction, a general averment that the value of the right sought to be protected exceeds the sum specified by the statute is ordinarily sufficient;[26] but where it appears from the face of the bill or complaint that the sum or value in controversy is less than or does not exceed that specified by the statute, the petition for removal must set up facts showing that it exceeds such amount, and a general allegation is not sufficient.[27] In a suit involving a matter as to which the federal court's jurisdiction is also subject to a maximum limitation, the petition should show that the sum in controversy does not exceed the amount to which the jurisdiction is so limited.[28] A statement of the value or amount in controversy on information and belief does not make the petition defective;[29] and it has been held that the failure of the petition to allege expressly that the amount or value stated to be in controversy is exclusive of interest is not a fatal defect, where no question of interest is or can be involved in the suit.[30]

[§ 244] (c) Amendment of Petition.[31] Where, upon the face of a petition for the removal of a suit from a state court to a federal court and of the whole record, sufficient grounds for removal are shown, the petition may be amended in the state or federal court to correct a defective or informal statement of the jurisdictional facts,[32] or to set forth expressly matters which in legal effect appear from the record,[33] or to make the petition conform to facts newly discovered;[34] but no amendment may be made, at least after the time for effecting a removal has expired,[35] for the purpose of supplying jurisdictional facts which have been wholly omitted and which do not appear from the face of the record,[36] or for the purpose of setting up another and different ground of removal, founded upon different facts.[37] Thus an amendment has been held permissible to correct defects and irregularities in allegations relating to diversity of citizenship,[38] or nonresidence,[39] or an inadvertent failure to show the dismissal of the suit as to one of several defendants,[40] or where the petition stated in general terms that the cause arose under the constitution and laws of the United States, without specifying the facts showing that to be the case,[41] or where it prayed removal to the wrong court,[42] or asked removal only as to petitioner, who showed a separable controversy with plaintiff, and not the removal of the whole suit.[43] Similarly, an amendment has been allowed where the jurisdictional facts were stated in the petition informally[44] or in the form of conclusions of law,[45] and for the correction of similar defects in an accompanying affidavit[46] or in the record of the state court.[47] A petition cannot be amended, however, to supply an allegation of diversity of citizenship[48] or nonresidence[49] which has been wholly omitted from the petition and does not appear in the face of the record, where the ground upon which the removal is sought is difference of citizenship,[50] or to show that such diversity of citizenship[51] or nonresidence[52] existed at the time when the action was begun, although its existence at the date of petition for removal was properly alleged;[53] and a petition based upon such ground which alleges, as to a corporation, merely that it is a citizen of a designated state, without alleging that it was organized by or under the laws thereof, cannot be corrected by amendment.[54] Similarly, where the amount or value in controversy is material to the removability of the suit,[55] a petition failing to show that such amount or value exceeds the jurisdictional sum cannot be amended to supply such averment.[56]

Consent of court to amendment. The consent of the court to the amendment of a petition for removal is not necessary and need not be procured.[57]

Time for amendment. An amendment to a petition for removal has been held too late when offered at the hearing on a motion to remand the cause;[58] but it has been held that a petition may be permitted by the federal court to be amended even after final judgment, if the court still has control of the record.[59] An amendment is clearly too late, however, when made after remand of the suit to the state court,[60] or after a removal has been properly denied on account of the insufficiency of the petition, if the time for removal as prescribed by the statutes has expired,[61] except that where leave to amend is granted by the court in such case upon a motion made before the expiration of the time prescribed by statute for taking the removal, the amendment is to be treated as if filed on the date of the motion.[62] Where a removal has been wrongly denied, however, the fact that the state court proceeds to judgment in the suit does not prevent the federal court from permitting the amendment of the petition.[63] An amendment will not be allowed in the supreme court[64] or in the circuit court of appeals[65] of the United States, upon appeal thereto, except when the adverse parties consent to such amendment, in which case it may be permitted.[66]

Subsequent pleading as amendment. Inasmuch as defects in a petition for removal may be cured by the allegations of the pleadings showing the existence of the jurisdictional facts,[67] a pleading filed in the state court after the filing of the petition for removal may be treated as an amendment to such petition in so far as it alleges the facts upon which defective or informal averments of the petition rest.[68] But no amendment of the pleadings or rearrangement of the parties can give the federal court jurisdiction where the original petition and the record as it existed at the time of filing the petition did not show that the suit was removable.[69]

[§ 245] (3) Bond—(a) In General. Under the provisions of the statute relating to the removal of suits from a state court to a federal court on the ground of diversity of citizenship or because arising under the constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States, which requires the party seeking removal to file with his petition[70] a bond for his entering in the federal court within thirty days a transcript of the record, and for paying all costs that may be awarded by the federal court if it shall hold that the cause was wrongfully or improperly removed thereto, and also for his appearing and entering special bail in the suit if special bail was originally requisite therein,[71] the due filing of a proper bond is a condition precedent and essential to the right of removal,[72] and so the state court does not lose its jurisdiction, and is without power to order a removal, unless a proper bond is given.[73]

Provisions and conditions. The bond filed with a petition for removal must provide for the acts and matters specified by the statute,[74] including the payment of costs in case of a remand,[75] the entry in the federal court of a transcript of the record,[76] and the appearance of the petitioning party in such court;[77] but where special bail was not originally required in the state court the bond need contain no condition for the entry of such bail in the federal court.[78] Moreover, the statutory provision as to special bail does not refer to a delivery bond or bond for the forthcoming of property, but only to an undertaking for the personal appearance of a party.[79] It has been held that a general provision for the doing of such acts as are required by statute is not sufficient to cure an omission to provide expressly for a particular necessary act;[80] but there is authority to the contrary.[81] A bond is sufficient where its provisions and conditions follow substantially the language of the statute.[82] Where fewer than all the persons named in the suit as defendants have been served and have become parties, the bond need not be conditioned for the appearance of others than those served.[83] A bond is not fatally defective because it provides for the filing of the transcript in the wrong division of the federal court,[84] or because the day on which the transcript is required to be filed is improperly designated;[85] and a bond conditioned for defendant's appearance in the district court of the United States was held not defective although under the law as it then stood the removal was to the circuit court.[86] A bond conditioned for the entry of the transcript in the federal court of another district than that to which the cause is removable,[87] however, or for such entry at a time other than that prescribed by statute,[88] is not sufficient, nor is a bond conditioned that one not a party to the suit will perform the required acts to effect a removal.[89]

Penalty. It is proper practice to insert in the bond a provision for the payment of a specified sum as penalty for a failure to comply with the condition,[90] and where the sum so specified is clearly enough to cover all costs and damages that might in any event be awarded the bond is sufficient.[91] An undertaking to pay an indefinite amount satisfies the statute,[92] however, and the omission of a fixed penalty is not ground for remanding the suit,[93] although it may cause the state court to refuse its approval of the bond.[94] But where the tenor of the bond is merely an undertaking to pay a fixed sum and the amount thereof is left blank, no liability is created and the bond is therefore insufficient.[95]

Parties. It has been held that a removal bond need not be made by the petitioner, but may be executed by another as principal,[96] but there is authority for the contrary view.[97] The obligee of the bond should be plaintiff, and not the state or the people.[98] The bond must be joint and several,[99] and a bond which is merely joint is not sufficient.[1]

Surety and justification. A formal defendant, who is merely a nominal party to the suit and who does not join in the petition for removal, may be a surety upon a removal bond;[2] and an attorney at law is a sufficient surety if he is accepted as such by the state court, even though a rule of such court disqualifies him.[3] When the surety is a corporation organized under the laws of a state other than that in which the suit is pending, it need not be shown to have authority to do business in the latter state, at least where, under the state law, a corporation not having procured such authority can take no advantage of its failure so to do.[4] In view of the statutory requirement of good and sufficient surety, it is proper practice to add to the bond proof that the sureties are responsible and sufficient;[5] but it has been held that the sureties are not required to justify until a rule or order requiring them to do so has been made.[6]

Execution. When the petitioner for the removal is named as principal in the bond, it may be executed in his name by his attorney at law;[7] and a bond executed by such attorney without prior authorization by the client may be ratified by the latter at any time before an order for a remand.[8] The fact that the bond is executed in behalf of the surety by an agent or attorney in fact whose authority does not appear does not render the bond defective, in the absence of any showing of a want of authority on the part of the person so signing,[9] there being a presumption that he was duly authorized unless the contrary is shown;[10] but a bond executed in behalf of the corporation by its treasurer has been held to be invalid where the authority of such officer to act for the corporation is not shown and the corporate seal is not affixed.[11] The bond need not be acknowledged.[12]

Seals. The absence of a seal on a removal bond does not vitiate the bond where the state statute provides that the omission of a seal shall not affect the validity of any document,[13] or expressly makes a bond valid without a seal.[14] Otherwise, however, the bond must be sealed in order to be valid.[15] In accordance with the rules applicable to seals generally,[16] a scrawl, without wax, intended as a seal,[17] or an impression upon the paper,[18] is ordinarily a sufficient seal; and, where the state statute so provides, the letters "L. S." or the word "Seal" is sufficient.[19]

Time for filing.[20] The removal bond must be given and filed at the time the petition for removal is presented,[21] and accordingly, at or before the time for removal expires;[22] and an order cannot be thereafter made allowing the bond to be filed nunc pro tunc as of the date of filing the petition.[23]

Mode of attacking sufficiency. The sufficiency of a removal bond cannot be questioned upon a general demurrer to the petition for removal,[24] but can be put into issue only by specific objections.[25]

Waiver of objections. Objections founded upon defects in the form of a removal bond[26] and objections to the sufficiency of the sureties[27] are waived by taking subsequent steps in the cause without moving to remand on account thereof; and the objection that the signatures to the bond are not properly acknowledged or proved,[28] that one by whom the bond is executed in behalf of the surety is not shown to be properly authorized,[29] or that the sureties have not justified,[30] is waived if not made in the state court at the time the bond is presented thereto.[31]

[§ 246] (b) Determination of Sufficiency. The state court in which a suit is pending has power to determine whether a bond for the removal of the cause to a federal court is sufficient, in substance and form, under the provisions of the statute providing for removal on the ground of diversity of citizenship or because arising under the federal constitution, laws, or treaties;[32] and the determination of the sufficiency of the sureties is also largely within the discretion of such court.[33] The approval of the state court is not, however, essential, in the sense that its failure or refusal to approve a bond which is in fact sufficient would deprive the petitioner of the right of removal;[34] and it cannot arbitrarily reject a bond tendered for its approval.[35]

Review of refusal. A refusal by the state court to receive or approve a bond may be reviewed, at least when not based upon the insufficiency of the sureties, by the federal court to which removal was sought, on the hearing of a motion to remand the cause,[36] or by the supreme court of the United States upon a writ of error to the final judgment of the state court of last resort.[37]

[§ 247] (c) Amendment of Bond. Mere formal or technical defects in a removal bond may ordinarily be cured by amendment of the bond, whether or not the time for removal has expired;[38] and it has been held that the state court should not reject a bond on account of such defects without giving the petitioning party opportunity so to correct them,[39] although it need not postpone the trial of the cause in order to allow time to amend the bond.[40] Thus the omission of a seal, where no seal is essential to the validity of the bond,[41] a mistake in the name of the obligee,[42] the omission of a penal clause,[43] or a failure to show the authority of the person to whom the bond was executed in behalf of a corporate surety, if such showing is required,[44] may be cured by amendment. The omission of an essential element of the bond,[45] however, such as the want of any provision for the payment of costs in case of remand,[46] the failure to attach a seal where that is required,[47] or, where the bond contains a penal clause, the omission of the amount of the penalty,[48] cannot be supplied or cured by amendment, after the time for removal has expired.

Necessity of specification of amount in penalty clause see supra § 245.

[§ 248] (d) Liability on Bond.[49] The amount specified in the penal clause, if any, of a bond given for the removal of a cause from a state court to a federal court, is merely a penalty and not liquidated damages for a breach of the condition of the bond;[50] and the amount for which the sureties on the bond are liable cannot exceed the costs awarded upon a remand.[51] A dismissal of the suit, after removal, for failure of the removing party to appear and put in special bail, where required, gives rise to no liability on the bond.[52]

Enforcement of liability. In the absence of any stipulation in a removal bond for the entry of judgment against the surety in case of a breach of the condition, his liability is enforceable only in an independent action on the bond.[53]

[§ 249] (4) Notice. The requirement of the statute relating to the removal, from a state court to a federal court, of suits arising under the federal constitution, laws, or treaties or involving diversity of citizenship, that written notice of the petition[54] and bond[55] for removal shall be given to the adverse party before filing the same[56] is mandatory,[57] and the federal court to which the cause is attempted to be removed ordinarily has no jurisdiction to receive or retain the suit where objection is made that such notice has not been given.[58] It has been held, however, that no notice is necessary where removability arises during the trial of the cause and the parties are all present in court when the application for removal is made;[59] but there is authority to the contrary.[60] Neither as a matter of law or of comity is it necessary that notice be given to the state court.[61]

Time of notice. The notice need not be given any particular length of time before presenting the petition and bond for removal, since it is notice of the petition and bond and not notice of any hearing that is required,[62] and so notice at any time, however short, is sufficient.[63]

Sufficiency of notice. The purpose of the notice required by statute being merely to advise plaintiff that the suit and all further proceedings therein are about to be transferred to another tribunal,[64] to submit to his scrutiny the sufficiency of the petition and bond,[65] and to enable him to speed proceedings if defendant delays therein,[66] a notice which recites that defendant will, on a specified day,[67] or on or before a designated date,[68] file in the state court a petition and bond for removal is sufficient, at least where copies of such petition and bond are served before filing.[69] It is not essential, however, that the time[70] or place[71] of presenting or filing the petition and bond be stated in the notice, since it is not for the purpose of enabling plaintiff to object to or resist the removal.[72] Presentation of a petition and bond to counsel for plaintiff, and his acceptance of service of a rule to show cause why the suit should not be removed, has been held sufficient notice within the statute.[73]

Service. The requirement of the statute that notice shall be "given" requires it to be served upon the adverse party.[74]

Waiver of notice. The right to notice of the petition and bond for removal may be waived by the adverse party.[75] Where plaintiff appears before the state court and resists the removal, any failure to give notice is thereby waived.[76]

[§ 250] (5) Presentment and Filing of Petition and Bond.[77] Under the provision of the statute relating to the removal of causes from a state court to a federal court on the ground of diversity of citizenship or because arising under the constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States, requiring the petition[78] and bond[79] for removal to be filed in the suit in the state court,[80] it has been held by some authorities that the mere filing of a petition and bond in the office of the clerk of the state court in which the suit is pending is not sufficient, but that such petition and bond must be presented to such state court and its approval thereof obtained,[81] except that in a cause in which the clerk has jurisdiction, under the state statutes, to make orders and render final judgment, the petition and bond are properly presented to him;[82] and so where a petition and bond have been filed, but a presentment thereof and motion for removal are withdrawn, it is held that the state court does not have jurisdiction and no removal is effectuated.[83] According to other authorities, however, while such presentment for acceptance has been recognized as the proper and preferable practice,[84] it is not indispensable, but filing such petition and bond with the clerk is sufficient,[85] the papers, when filed, becoming part of the record of the suit in the state court.[86] Even though presentment to the court be regarded as necessary, the failure or refusal of the court to accept a petition and bond which are in fact sufficient to entitle the applicant to a removal does not deprive him of such right.[87]

Presentment to judge in chambers. The presentment of a petition and bond for removal to, and its approval by, a judge of the state court in which the cause is pending, in his chambers, is ordinarily regarded as a sufficient presentation and approval;[88] but there is authority for the contrary view.[89]

Manner of presentment. An oral statement to the court that a petition and bond for removal have been filed constitutes a sufficient presentation, without production of the petition and bond, where the court does not require or request such production.[90]

Ex parte presentment. A petition and bond for removal may be presented ex parte to the state court for its approval,[91] and the statutory provision requiring notice of the petition and bond to be given[92] does not impose upon the state court any duty to hold a hearing on the application.[93] It is not even necessary that the petitioner be personally present at the time of the presentment.[94]

Place of filing. A petition and bond for removal should be filed in the state court in which the suit is pending at the time of such filing,[95] even though it may originally have been brought in another court of the state.[96] Moreover, such papers must be filed in the clerk's office in the county in which the venue is laid and the suit is pending,[97] and no removal is effectuated by filing them in the office of the clerk in another county where the court is then sitting, although the approval of the court is there obtained.[98]

Filing in vacation. Where the view obtains that filing a petition and bond for removal with the clerk of the state court in which the suit is pending is sufficient, without presentation to the court,[99] filing such papers at a time when the state court is in vacation is sufficient;[1] but where the contrary rule is followed, that the approval of the court is requisite to entitle the petitioner to a removal,[2] the fact that the court is not in session or is in vacation at the time the petition and bond are filed does not obviate the necessity of such presentation,[3] although such filing during a vacation of the state court is sufficient if the petition and bond are presented to and approved by a judge in chambers, where such method of obtaining approval is recognized as sufficient.[4]

Indorsement of filing. It is not essential to the right of removal that the petition and bond shall be marked by the clerk as "filed," provided they are in fact filed in his office,[5] or are accepted by him, for filing, outside his office;[6] and so a failure to indorse the filing upon the petition or bond,[7] or the indorsement of an erroneous file mark thereon,[8] does not affect the validity of the removal proceedings.

[§ 251] b. Suits and Prosecutions against Persons Asserting or Relying upon Civil Rights Laws. The statute relating to the removal from a state court to a federal court of civil suits and criminal prosecutions against persons who are denied or cannot enforce in such state court any right secured by a civil rights law, or against officers or other persons for acts done or refused to be done by them under or on account of any such law,[9] provides for the removal of such a suit or prosecution upon the verified petition of defendant, stating the facts, and filed in the state court; whereupon, it is provided, further proceedings in the state court shall cease, but all bail and other security given shall continue with the same force and effect as if the suit or prosecution had continued to final judgment and execution in the state court. The statute further provides that it shall be the duty of the clerk of the state court to furnish petitioner with copies of the process and all papers and proceedings in the case, and that if such copies are filed in the federal court on the first day of its session, the cause shall proceed in the same manner as if originally brought therein. It is further provided that if the clerk of the state court refuses or neglects to furnish such copies, the petitioner may docket the cause in the federal court, which shall thereupon have jurisdiction thereof, and may, upon proof of the clerk's refusal or neglect and upon reasonable notice to plaintiff, require plaintiff to file a declaration, petition or complaint in the cause, and upon his default may dismiss the cause at his costs; but that if, without such refusal or neglect of the clerk, petitioner fails to file such copies in the federal court, such court shall give a certificate stating such failure, and upon production thereof in the state court the cause shall proceed therein as if no petition for removal had been filed.[10] The statute also provides that where all the acts necessary to effectuate a removal have been performed, if the petitioning defendant is in actual custody on process issued by the state court, it shall be the duty of the clerk of the federal court to issue a writ of habeas corpus cum causa, and of the marshal, acting under the writ, to take the body of defendant into his custody, to be dealt with according to the orders of the federal court or, if in vacation, of any judge thereof; and that the marshal shall file with or deliver to the clerk of the state court a duplicate copy of such writ.[11]

Petition. The petition for removal should specifically set forth the facts which bring the cause within the statute;[12] and a mere general allegation in the language of the statute that defendant is denied or cannot enforce a right secured by the laws providing for equal civil rights is insufficient to show a right of removal.[13]

Effectuation of removal by federal court.[14] If the state court refuses to recognize defendant's right to remove, the federal court may issue a writ of certiorari to effectuate the removal;[15] but if defendant is in actual custody and a writ of habeas corpus cum causa is issued,[16] it serves to remove both the cause and the person of defendant.[17] The course pointed out by other statutory provisions for the docketing of the case in the federal court by defendant if the clerk of the state court fails or refuses to furnish copies of the proceedings[18] is an additional and summary method of proceeding to effectuate a removal where only the clerk is delinquent.[19]

Issuance of writ. Under the provision of the statute making it the duty of the clerk of the federal court, upon the removal of a cause, to issue a writ of habeas corpus cum causa where the petitioning defendant is in actual custody,[20] it has been held that the writ should not be issued by the clerk without being allowed by a judge of the court.[21]

[§ 252] c. Actions Concerning Land Claimed under Grants from Different States. The statute relating to the removal from a state court to a federal court of actions in which the title to land is concerned[22] provides that if one or more of plaintiffs or defendants in such an action shall state to the court, and make affidavit if required, that he or they claim and will rely on a right or title to the land under a grant from a state, and shall produce the original grant or an exemplification of it, unless the loss of public records has made that impossible, and shall move that any one or more of the adverse party inform the court whether he or they claim a right or title to such land under a grant from some other state, the party or parties so required shall give such information, or otherwise not be allowed to plead such grant or give it in evidence at the trial; whereupon, it is provided, if such adverse party or parties inform the court that he or they do claim under a grant from another state, any one or more of the party moving for such information may then remove the cause on petition and bond as prescribed by the statute relating to the removal of causes arising under the federal constitution, laws or treaties or in which difference of citizenship exists.[23]

Determination of Right To Remove.[24] It being only upon the filing, in a state court in which is pending a suit of one of the classes removable upon application to such state court,[25] of a petition for removal which properly shows that the cause is removable,[26] accompanied, where required, by a sufficient bond,[27] that the removal of such cause to a federal court is effectuated,[28] the state court has the right and is under a duty to decide for itself, purely as a question of law, whether or not upon its face the petition, considered in connection with the rest of the record, presents a removable case and thereby has terminated the jurisdiction of such court.[29] For this purpose the allegations of fact in the petition for removal[30] and in plaintiff's pleadings in the suit,[31] except, as to the latter, where their averments are controverted by the removal petition,[32] must be taken by the state court as true; but mere conclusions need not be so treated,[33] and, of course, any allegations of law need not be accepted as sound or binding.[34] If, so regarding the removal petition and the record, the cause does not appear to be removable, the state court is not bound to[35] and should not[36] surrender jurisdiction, but may and should proceed as if no application for removal had been made,[37] although it is only where the nonremovability of the cause clearly appears on the face of the
